

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS

ANNOTATED.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Carrie LOUGHIN
v.

James McCAULLEY et al., App'ls.

1. The provision of a state Constitution against limitation of liability for injuries resulting in death cannot prevail over the act of Congress permitting limitation of liability for maritime losses.
2. The limitation of liability of the owners of vessels, for maritime losses, by U. S. Rev. Stat. 1878, § 4283, may be administered in an action at law against them in a state court to recover for death caused by a collision.
3. The method for limitation of the ship owner's liability for maritime losses provided in the act of Congress of 1851 by transfer to a trustee is not exclusive; but the limitation may be claimed under a general denial in an action at law.

NOTE.—Administration of Federal laws in state courts.

- I. Introductory.
- II. Civil laws.
- III. Criminal and penal laws.

I. Introductory.

The difficulty encountered in reaching a correct answer to the question suggested by the note—a difficulty to which so great a master of constitutional law as Judge Story has contributed by statements in some of his opinions and in his work on the Constitution—has arisen mainly from the tendency to confuse the jurisdiction of the court with the subject-matter over which it is exercised, and the failure to discriminate between the source of jurisdiction and the source of the rights which are the subjects of the jurisdiction. That such jurisdiction and rights may have different sources is illustrated by the practice of the courts of enforcing rights arising out of acts of a foreign country.

This illustration is used by Hamilton in the Federalist (No. 82), where he expresses his opinion that unless the state courts are expressly excluded by acts of Congress they will take cognizance of the causes to which those acts may give birth.

Judge Story, however, in his work on the Constitution (vol. 2, 5th ed. p. 535) says: "And it is only in those cases where, previous to the Constitution, state tribunals possessed jurisdiction independent of national authority that they can now constitutionally exercise a concurrent jurisdiction." He evidently considered this

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. L. Cheney, John F. Lewis, and John G. Johnson, for appellants:

The defendants should have been permitted to show what fractional parts each owned in the tug, and the value of the tug.

There can be no question but that the court of common pleas of Philadelphia had jurisdiction to try this case if the tort was committed within the limits of the state.

American S. B. Co. v. Chase, 16 Wall. 533, 21 L. ed. 372; Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 100, 23 L. ed. 819; McCullough v. New York & N. S. B. Co. 20 U. S. App. 570, 61 Fed. Rep. 364, 9 C. C. A. 521; Wallace v. M'Connell, 13 Pet. 138, 10 L. ed. 95; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 583, 15 L. ed. 1028; Mallett proposition a corollary of the proposition stated by him in Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97, that Congress cannot confer any of the judicial power of the United States upon the state courts.

This line of argument ignores the possibility that the state courts may, under the state Constitution and state laws, have jurisdiction enabling them to lay hold of new rights as they arise, whatever the source of those rights may be. It was evidently the origin of his dictum in Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97, that state courts cannot take direct cognizance of cases arising under the laws of the United States, since no such jurisdiction existed before the adoption of the Constitution, and it cannot be conferred by Congress. Justice Bradley indicates the fallacy of the argument when he says in Claffin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833, that the dictum is only true as to jurisdiction (not rights) depending on United States authority.

The same confusion with reference to jurisdiction and rights is apparent in Voorhies v. Friable, 25 Mich. 476, 12 Am. Rep. 291, which denied the jurisdiction of a state court over an action by an assignee in bankruptcy, under § 35 of the bankruptcy act, to set aside a transfer by the bankrupt as a preference in violation of the act, upon the ground that the right as declared upon by the bill was wholly created by the act. The court says that the state courts can exercise no new "powers" wholly dependent on, and conferred by, statutes of the United States. The minor premise of the argument evidently is that if a state court were to take

v. Dexter, 1 Curt. C. C. 178, Fed. Cas. No. 8,988.

That the action occurred on a navigable river did not defeat the jurisdiction of the state court, if the place was within the boundaries of the state.

American S. B. Co. v. Chase, 16 Wall. 532, 21 L. ed. 372; McCullough v. New York & N. S. B. Co. 20 U. S. App. 570, 61 Fed. Rep. 364, 9 C. C. A. 521.

If the court could hear the case at all, it certainly could hear the defense to it.

23 U. S. Stat. at L. 57.

The limitation of the owner's liability is a necessary incident to the ownership of vessel property, and all rights of action against owners as such are limited by this act.

The Rebecca, 1 Ware, 187, Fed. Cas. No. 11,619; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344, 12 L. ed. 465; cognizance of a case arising out of the laws of the United States it would be exercising a "new power" wholly dependent on, and conferred by, statutes of the United States. The major premise is undoubtedly correct, and, so far as the minor premise is true, the conclusion against the state court's jurisdiction is justified; but it is not necessarily true, since the state court may have inherent power, not at all dependent on acts of Congress, adequate to the enforcement of new rights, although such rights emanate from acts of Congress.

Gilbert v. Priest, 65 Barb. 444, made a similar decision, based on much the same reasoning. It was, in effect, overruled by Cook v. Whipple, 53 N. Y. 150, which points out that the jurisdiction of the state court over the subject-matter does not depend upon the source from which the subject-matter emanates.

Justice Washington in Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, accepts the doctrine of Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97, that Congress cannot confer any of the judicial power of the United States upon the state courts, but explains it, and shows that, while it prevents Congress from conferring jurisdiction upon state courts, it does not, so long as Congress does not exercise its undoubted power to make the jurisdiction of the Federal courts exclusive, prevent the state courts from exercising jurisdiction, even over causes arising out of the acts of Congress, if they can find the requisite authority in their own inherent powers. The opinion states and adopts Hamilton's position already alluded to.

Justice Washington's explanation of the doctrine has been generally followed by the later cases, and is expressly approved in Clafin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833.

It is thus apparent that the state courts must look to their own inherent powers for the source of their concurrent jurisdiction over cases arising out of the Federal laws, and that the only purpose subverted by the provisions of acts of Congress purporting to confer such concurrent jurisdiction is to negative the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts, or to withdraw the classes of cases to which they relate from the exclusive jurisdiction previously conferred upon such courts.

II. Civil laws.

Under the influence of the doctrine of Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, it was held in Delaheld v. Illinois, 2 Hill, 159 (an action by the state of Illinois against a citizen of New York), that the Federal Constitution did not divest the state courts of pre-existing 48 L. R. A.

Walker v. Western Transp. Co. 3 Wall. 150, 18 L. ed. 172; Butler v. Boston & S. S. Co. 130 U. S. 555, 32 L. ed. 1023, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612.

It cannot be objected that the defendants should have pleaded specially the act of 1884, because the Pennsylvania procedure act of May 25, 1887, provides expressly, "special pleading is hereby abolished," and "the only plea in the action of trespass shall be not guilty."

Even under the act of 1851, it has been most distinctly asserted, and reasserted, that the benefits of a limitation of liability to the value of the vessel could be obtained in other ways than by the procedure referred to in the act, and under the rules of the Supreme Court.

The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24, sub nom. National Steam Nav. Co. v. Dyer, 26 L. ed.

jurisdiction, and that, therefore, Congress did not violate the Constitution in failing to make the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court in suits by a state against a citizen of another state exclusive, notwithstanding that the judicial power of the United States is declared by the Federal Constitution to extend to such suits.

United States v. Dodge, 14 Johns. 95, held that an action of debt by the United States on a bond for the payment of duties to the collector would lie in the state court. Sections 9 and 11 of the judiciary act purport to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the state courts of suits at common law where the United States is plaintiff.

Teall v. Felton, 1 N. Y. 537, 49 Am. Dec. 352, sustained an action of trover against a postmaster for detaining a newspaper, notwithstanding the contention that if any action could be maintained against him the jurisdiction of the Federal court would be exclusive. It was argued by defendant that the case was one of a class of which the state courts did not take cognizance when the Federal Constitution was adopted, since the postoffice department was entirely the creation of the national statute. The court replied, however, that the plaintiff was not seeking redress under the postoffice laws, but was simply seeking to recover in an appropriate common-law tribunal, competent to afford the remedy, and in a form of action more ancient than the Federal Constitution or the acts of Congress.

Moyer v. McCullough, 1 Ind. 339, held that suit would lie in the state court by a party having the equitable title to public land to obtain the legal title from one to whom the patent was issued by a mistake, notwithstanding that the question depended on the acts of Congress.

Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. American Exch. Bank, 92 Va. 495, 44 L. R. A. 449, 23 S. E. 935, holds that the section of the United States Revised Statutes forbidding railroad companies to keep cattle confined in cars for more than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading them may be made the basis of an action by a shipper in the state court for negligence.

United States v. Graff, 4 Hun. 634, upheld the jurisdiction of the state court over an action by the United States for duties unpaid on imported goods upon the ground that the primary object of the action was, not simply to execute the laws of the United States, but to collect a debt.

Ammdown v. Freeland, 101 Mass. 303, 3 Am. Rep. 359, holds that the state court has jurisdiction of the action given to sellers of goods 1001; Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 578, 27 L. ed. 1038, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, 617; The Doris Eckhoff, 30 Fed. Rep. 140; Miller v. O'Brien, 35 Fed. Rep. 779; Craig v. Continental Ins. Co. 141 U. S. 638, 35 L. ed. 886, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 97; The Rosa, 53 Fed. Rep. 132; The Garden City, 26 Fed. Rep. 766.

If the court was unable to extend to the defendants the benefits conferred by the act of 1884, it had no jurisdiction of the cause.

Butler v. Boston & S. S. S. Co. 130 U. S. 555, 32 L. ed. 1023, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612.

Mcassrs. Fred. Taylor Pusey and Wendell P. Bowman, for appellee:

The 4th section of the act of 1851 provides that a transfer of the interest of the owners to a trustee, to be appointed by the court, shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the act; but the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the giving of a stipulation for the value of the vessel as the court may think proper, or the paying of the money into court, is sufficient compliance with the requirements of the law.

Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 578, 27 L. ed. 1038, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, 617; Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104, 20 L. ed. 585.

The defendants made no offer whatever to give a stipulation, or to pay the value into court, or to convey the vessel to a trustee, so that it is at once evident that they are not entitled to the benefits of the law in this proceeding on this account, irrespective of the question as to whether they could receive its benefits at all in the state courts.

The state court has no jurisdiction at all to administer the benefits of the limited liability laws, and they can only be adminis-by United States Stat. 1864, chap. 173, § 97, to recover from the buyer duties imposed on the goods subsequently to the contract.

Actions by or against national banks.

The question as to the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts over causes arising out of the Federal laws has been frequently raised in actions brought by, or against, national banks. As such banks are the creatures of the Federal laws, and must look to them for the definition of their powers and the source of their authority, actions or proceedings by or against them, of whatever nature, are generally regarded as arising under the laws of Congress, and there is express authority for the position, at least so far as concerns actions by such a bank, in Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204. The correctness of the position with reference to actions against the bank where plaintiff's pleadings admit its existence and authority has been challenged by Cooke v. State Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 96, and Ulster County Sav. Inst. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 59 How. Pr. 482; but Cadle v. Tracy, 11 Blatchf. 101, Fed. Cas. No. 2,279, expressly holds, on the authority of Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204, supra, that actions against such banks are necessarily cases arising under the laws of the United States; and the other cases involving the question of concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts over such actions have so treated them.

Mandamus will lie in a state court to compel the officers of a national bank to exhibit to a county assessor a list of names and residences of shareholders with the number of their shares, as required by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5210. Paul v. McGraw, 8 Wash. 296, 28 Pac. 532; Paul v. Furth, 3 Wash. 296, 28 Pac. 532, and Paul v. Chapin, 3 Wash. 433, 28 Pac. 760.

The state courts have jurisdiction of a suit to compel the directors of a national bank to declare a dividend. Hiscock v. Lacy, 9 Misc. 578, 30 N. Y. Supp. 360.

Brinkerhoff v. Bostwick, 88 N. Y. 52, and Kelson v. Burrows, 9 Abb. N. C. 260, hold that a state court has jurisdiction of an action by the stockholders of a national bank against its directors to recover damages sustained through the latter's negligence.

Assumpsit will lie in a state court against a national bank. Dow v. Irasburgh Nat. Bank, 50 Vt. 112, 28 Am. Rep. 493.

It is true that when these actions were decided the Federal statutes expressly gave, or attempted to give, certain state courts concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal courts; but such jurisdiction, conformably to Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, appears to have been traced to the inherent powers of the state courts, rather than to the acts of Congress; and there are a number of cases that uphold the jurisdiction of the state courts over actions by or against national banks, even upon the assumption that provisions of the Federal statutes purporting to confer concurrent jurisdiction do not apply.

Thus, First Nat. Bank v. Hubbard, 49 Vt. 8, 24 Am. Rep. 97, expressly recognizes the doctrine that civil cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States may be tried and determined in the state courts, unless exclusive jurisdiction of them has been vested in the Federal courts, and holds that the state courts would have jurisdiction of suits brought by national banks, even if § 57 of the act of 1864, purporting to confer concurrent jurisdiction on them, only applied to actions against, and not to actions by, national banks.

So, also, Casey v. Adams, 102 U. S. 66, 26 L. ed. 52, after holding that the provisions of the Federal statutes purporting to confer concurrent jurisdiction upon certain state courts did not apply to local actions, upheld the jurisdiction of a state court, not within those provisions, over such an action.

And Fresno Nat. Bank v. San Joaquin County Super. Ct. 83 Cal. 491, 24 Pac. 187; Adams v. Daunis, 29 La. Ann. 315; Cooke v. State Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 96; Robinson v. National Bank, 81 N. Y. 385, 37 Am. Rep. 508; and Holmes v. National Bank, 18 S. C. 31, 44 Am. Rep. 558,—upheld the jurisdiction of state courts not within those provisions of the Federal statutes, after holding that the provisions were merely permissive, and not exclusive.

First Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 132 U. S. 141, 33 L. ed. 282, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37, upheld the jurisdiction of a state court not within such provisions, upon the ground that they merely created a personal privilege that could be waived.

It will be observed that each one of these various constructions of the provisions of the Federal statutes with reference to concurrent jurisdiction left the concurrent jurisdiction of the state court without the express sanction of Congress, so that in those cases also the jurisdiction must have been traced to the inherent powers of the state courts.

Crocker v. Marine Nat. Bank, 101 Mass. 241, 3 Am. Rep. 336, while holding that § 57 of the act of 1864 prevents a national bank from being sued in a state court out of the city and county tered in the district court of the United States of the proper district, or in the circuit court on appeal.

Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104, 20 L. ed. 585; The Benefactor v. Mount, 103 U. S. 239, sub nom. New York & W. S. S. Co. v. Mount, 26 L. ed. 351; *Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Rep. 71; Benedict, Admiralty, 3d ed. p. 320, § 561.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The substantial question in this case is the

in which it is located, recognizes the general doctrine that civil cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States may be tried and determined in the state courts, unless the national Constitution and laws have vested jurisdiction of them in the Federal tribunals.

Actions by or against assignee in bankruptcy.

The question has also been frequently raised in actions brought by, or against, assignees in bankruptcy in the state courts.

Ward v. Jenkins, 10 Met. 591, upheld the jurisdiction of the state court over an action by such an assignee under the Federal bankrupt law of 1841, upon a contract made by the defendants with the bankrupt. The court held, in effect, that the jurisdiction of the state court in cases arising under the provisions of a Federal statute rested, not upon the ground of the judicial authority conferred as such by a law of the United States, but upon the ordinary powers of the state court acting, indeed, in the particular case upon legal rights which had been created or materially affected by the legislation of Congress.

The court further points out that under the Federal Constitution the laws of Congress are the supreme laws of the state,—as much so as statutes enacted by her own legislature.

Stevens v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank, 101 Mass. 109, 3 Am. Rep. 325; Hastings v. Fowler, 2 Ind. 216; Cogdell v. Exum, 69 N. C. 464, 12 Am. Rep. 657; Barnard v. Davis, 54 Ala. 585; Hoover v. Robinson, 3 Neb. 437; Peck v. Jenness, 16 N. H. 516, 43 Am. Dec. 573; Harrod v. Burgess, 6 Rob. (La.) 449; Russell v. Owen, 61 Mo. 185, and Johnson v. Bishop, Woolw. 324, Fed. Cas. No. 7,873,—are to the same effect.

Voorhies v. Frisbie, 25 Mich. 476, 12 Am. Rep. 291, as before shown, denied the jurisdiction of a state court over an action by an assignee in bankruptcy, under § 35 of the bankruptcy act of 1867, to set aside a transfer by the bankrupt as a preference in violation of the act. This decision rests, in part at least, upon the ground that the jurisdiction of the Federal courts was necessarily exclusive, since the right was created by the act. The court attempted to distinguish the case from Ward v. Jenkins, 10 Met. 591, upon the ground that in the latter action the right enforced existed at common law.

There is also an intimation in the opinion that the court considered that the right created by § 35 was in the nature of a penalty, and as such beyond the state courts' jurisdiction.

right of the appellants to have their liability for damages to the plaintiff limited to the value of their respective interests in the vessel which is alleged to have caused the injury. The act of Congress of March 3, 1851, § 3 (9 U. S. Stat. at L. 635 [chap. 43], Rev. Stat. 1878, § 4283), provides that "the liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction by the master, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods, or merchandise shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners respectively in such ship or vessel, and her freight then pend-

Brigham v. Claflin, 31 Wis. 607, 11 Am. Rep. 623, is to the same effect as Voorhies v. Frisbie, 25 Mich. 476, 12 Am. Rep. 291, supra, but brings out more prominently the penal character of the action. Bromley v. Goodrich, 40 Wis. 131, 22 Am. Rep. 685, reaffirms Brigham v. Claflin, and Sheldon v. Rounds, 40 Mich. 425, held that the bankruptcy court had exclusive jurisdiction of suits to determine the right of an assignee in bankruptcy to property where the right was disputed under the exemption clause of the bankrupt law of 1867, citing Voorhies v. Frisbie, 25 Mich. 476, 12 Am. Rep. 291.

Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 823, however, upheld the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts over suits under § 35.

Justice Bradley, who wrote the opinion, remarked that if an act of Congress gives a penalty to a party aggrieved without specifying a remedy for its enforcement there is no reason why it should not be enforced, if not provided otherwise by some act of Congress, by a proper action in the state court.

To the same effect as Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 823, are: Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521, 23 L. ed. 403; Davis v. Friedlander, 104 U. S. 570, 26 L. ed. 818; *McHenry v. Naturalisation proceedings.

As pointed out in a note to State ex rel. Rushworth v. Judges of Inferior Ct. of Common Pleas (N. J.) in 30 L. R. A. 763, the courts have not always been in accord as to the true source of the jurisdiction of the state court in naturalisation proceedings.

State v. Penney, 10 Ark. 621; Morgan v. Dudley, 18 B. Mon. 714, 68 Am. Dec. 735; Re Ramsden, 13 How. Pr. 435; and Ex parte McKenzie, 51 S. C. 244, 28 S. E. 468,—seem to hold, in conformity to the general doctrine of Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, that the juris-ing." And the act of June 26, 1884, § 18 (23 U. S. Stat. at L. 57 [chap. 121], 1 Supp. Rev. Stat. ed. 1891, p. 443), makes a substantially similar provision in more condensed phraseology: "That the individual liability of a shipowner shall be limited to the proportion of any or all debts and liabilities that his individual share of the vessel bears to the whole, and the aggregate liabilities of all the owners of a vessel on account of the same shall not exceed the value of such vessels, and freight pending." By the act of June 19, 1886, § 4 (24 Stat. 79 [chap. 421], 1 Supp. Rev. Stat. ed. 1891, p. 494), the act of 1884 is made to apply to "all vessels used on lakes or rivers or in inland navigation, including canal boats, barges, and lighters." In Butler v. Boston & S. S. Co. 130 U. S. 527, 32 L. ed. 1017, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612, it was held that this limitation of liability applies to actions for damages for death caused by negligence. And, on this point, see also Craig v. Continental Ins. Co. 141 U. S. 638, 35 L. ed. 886, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 97. It was further held in the former case that the limitation of liability was enacted by Congress as part of the maritime law of the United States, and is coextensive in its operation with the whole territorial domain of that law. It applies, therefore, to the case of a disaster happening within the limits of a county of a state, and to a case where the liability itself arises from a law of the state.

These statutory limitations of liability, so construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, would seem to settle the question in this case in favor of appellants. But it is argued for appellee that they cannot prevail against the prohibition in § 21 of article 3 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania against any limitation of the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in diction cannot rest alone upon the provisions of the acts of Congress which attempt to confer it, but that the state courts must, independently of such provisions, have power adequate to the performance of the acts required to be done in the process of naturalization.

Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U. S. 275, 41 L. ed. 715, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 326, however, holds that the doctrine that Congress cannot vest any of the judicial powers of the United States in the courts or judicial officers of the several states applies only to the trial and determination of "cases" in courts of record, and that Congress is still at liberty to authorize the judicial officers of the several states to exercise such power as is ordinarily given to officers not of record, such, for instance, as the power to naturalize aliens, and perform such other duties as may be regarded as incidental to the judicial power, rather than the judicial power itself.

That case, however, did not involve any question as to naturalization, but related to the power of Congress to authorize justices of the peace to issue warrants for deserting seamen.

When jurisdiction of state courts excluded.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether the jurisdiction of the Federal courts is made exclusive, and the state courts ousted of their concurrent jurisdiction, by an act of Congress which without words of exclusion, merely confers jurisdiction upon the Federal courts. It will be observed that in many cases Congress had either expressly granted concurrent jurisdiction to the state court, or had clearly negated exclusive jurisdiction in the Federal courts, so that this question did not arise.

Hamilton in stating the doctrine says that in every case in which the state courts are not "expressly" excluded by the acts of the national legislature such courts will take cognizance of the causes to which those acts may give birth.

Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, supra, held that the provisions of the Federal militia laws, conferring jurisdiction of the offense in question upon the Federal court martial, did not exclude the concurrent jurisdiction of the state court martial.

As already shown, Fresno Nat. Bank v. San Joaquin County Super. Ct. 83 Cal. 481, 24 Pac. 157; Adams v. Daunis, 29 La. Ann. 315; Cooke v. State Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 96; Robinson v. National Bank, 81 N. Y. 885, 37 Am. Rep. 508; and Holmes v. National Bank, 18 S. C. 31,—hold that the jurisdiction conferred on the Federal and certain state courts by § 5198, U. S.

Rev. Stat., is not exclusive of the jurisdiction of other state courts, while Crocker v. Marine Nat. Bank, 101 Mass. 241, 3 Am. Rep. 836, supra, and Cadle v. Tracy, 11 Blatchf. 101, Fed. Cas. No. 2,279, hold that the jurisdiction so conferred is exclusive.

Pettit v. Noble, 7 Bias. 449, Fed. Cas. No. 11,044, holds that § 629, U. S. Rev. Stat., giving United States courts jurisdiction of all suits by or against any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under any law providing for banking associations, does not devert the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts.

Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833, which approves the general doctrine of Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, intimates a doubt as to the correctness of the decision with reference to the effect of the Federal laws involved in that case on the concurrent jurisdiction.

Ward v. Jenkins, 10 Met. 591, supra, held that the various provisions of the Federal bankruptcy act of 1841, conferring jurisdiction upon the United States courts, did not exclude the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts, and the cases above cited as being to the same effect as that case must have held the same in respect to the act of 1841 or 1867, as the case may have been. The same is true of Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833, and the other cases, above cited, in line with it; and Wetmore v. McMillan, 57 Iowa, 344, 10 N. W. 725; Clark v. Ewing, 9 Bias. 440, 3 Fed. Rep. 83; Goodrich v. Wilson, 119 Mass. 429; Kidder v. Horrobin, 72 N. Y. 159; Olcott v. Maclean, 73 N. Y. 223; Wente v. Young, 12 Hun, 220; and Wheelock v. Lee, 54 How. Pr. 402,—expressly held that § 4974, U. S. Rev. Stat., providing that legal debts or assets of the bankrupt, if not in excess of $500, might be recovered in a state court, did not take away the jurisdiction of the state court when the debt exceeded that amount.

Copp v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 511, 12 L. R. A. 725, 9 So. 441, denied the jurisdiction of the state court over an action under the interstate commerce act for the recovery of damages for unlawful discrimination, upon the ground that the statute which created the right provided for a remedy before the interstate commerce commission or the district or circuit court of the United States, and that such remedies were exclusive under the rule that where a particular remedy is provided by law such remedy must be sought to the exclusion of all others.

death, and that, in any view, they cannot be administered by a Pennsylvania court in a common-law action.

As to the first objection, it is clear that neither statute nor Constitution of Pennsylvania can be set up against a right given by Congress in its control of the maritime law of the country. That control is paramount, and, when it has been exercised in a particular way, all state authority must conform to it.

The second objection—that the limitation cannot be administered by a state court in a common-law action—must depend primarily on the language of the acts of Congress, and the nature of the right which they confer.

Battin v. Kear, 2 Phila. 301, and Dudley v. Mayhew, 3 N. Y. 9, which were decided before the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over cases arising under the patent right laws was expressly made exclusive, held that § 17 of the act of Congress of July 4, 1836, providing that all cases of that class should be originally cognizable by the circuit courts of the United States, excluded the jurisdiction of the state courts. These decisions rest upon the ground that the rights of the patentee spring wholly from the Federal statutes, and therefore that the remedy provided by the statutes is exclusive.

Missouri River Packet Co. v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 79 Mo. 478, holds that the 1st section of act of Congress of July 26, 1866, "To Authorize the Construction of Certain Bridges," conferring jurisdiction upon the United States district court of any litigation arising from obstruction to navigation by the bridges authorized by the act, does not divest the common-law jurisdiction of the state courts over the matter.

When question arises incidentally.

If, as above shown, the state courts may take concurrent jurisdiction when a cause of action arises out of an act of Congress, a fortiori, they may, if they have adequate power and machinery to deal with them, take cognizance of questions incidentally arising under such an act, as in the principal case.

Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. ed. 97, supra, which goes as far as any case to uphold the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts over matters within the judicial power confided to the United States by the Constitution, recognizes the fact that such questions will arise incidentally in the state courts in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, and makes it the basis of an argument for the appellate jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court over judgments of the state courts. So, also, Rodney v. Illinois C. R. Co. 19 Ill. 42, while questioning the right of state tribunals to take direct cognizance of cases arising under Federal statutes, holds they can enforce such law when they come incidentally in question.

It may happen, that the state court does not have the necessary methods or machinery to enforce a right under a Federal statute, even when it arises incidentally. In that event, as shown by the opinions in the principal case, and in Chisholm v. Northern Transp. Co. 61 Barb. 363, the state court should dismiss the action.

The power of Congress to exclude from evidence in the state courts instruments not bearing required revenue stamps is discussed in a note to Knox v. Ross, — L. R. A. —.

Miscellaneous.

If such right is contingent on something to be done by the vessel owner or others, then we must look into the pleadings or the evidence of the acts of the parties. But if, on the other hand, the right is absolute, then, clearly, it cannot be defeated by the plaintiff's choice of the tribunal; and if the state court is unable, through defect of its jurisdiction over parties or subject-matter, or through its methods of procedure, to protect the right, then the court must dismiss the case for want of appropriate powers to determine it in accordance with the paramount law on the subject.

This brings us to the consideration of the acts of Congress. The limitation of liability tion as to what cases fall within the categories of cases of which Congress has declared the jurisdiction of the Federal courts shall be exclusive. Many of the cases which turn upon that question assume that the state courts have concurrent jurisdiction, unless the case falls within one of such categories.

There are many cases, for instance, which uphold the jurisdiction of the state courts in actions in which a defense going to the validity of a patent has been interposed, after holding that such defense does not bring the action within U. S. Rev. Stat. § 711, declaring that the Federal court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all cases arising under the patent right laws. The following are cases of that kind: Pratt v. Paris Gaslight & Coke Co. 168 U. S. 255, 42 L. ed. 453, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62; Dunbar v. Marden, 13 N. H. 311; Rich v. Atwater, 16 Conn. 409; Sherman v. Champlain Transp. Co. 31 Vt. 162; Clough v. Patrick, 37 Vt. 421; Burrall v. Jewett, 2 Paige, 134; Middlebrook v. Broadbent, 47 N. Y. 443, 7 Am. Rep. 457; Continental Store Service Co. v. Clark, 100 N. Y. 365, 3 N. E. 335; Head v. Stevens, 19 Wend. 411; Harmon v. Bird, 22 Wend. 113; Cross v. Huntly, 13 Wend. 385; Saxton v. Dodge, 57 Barb. 84; Geiger v. Cook, 3 Watts & S. 266; Slemmer's Appeal, 58 Pa. 155, 98 Am. Dec. 248; McClure v. Jeffrey, 8 Ind. 79; Nye v. Raymond, 16 Ill. 153; Page v. Dickerson, 23 Wis. 694, 9 Am. Rep. 532; Rice v. Garnhart, 34 Wis. 453, 17 Am. Rep. 448; Billings v. Ames, 32 Mo. 265.

III. Criminal and penal laws.

Criminal laws.

Notwithstanding that the judiciary act passed by the first Congress after the adoption of the Constitution expressly gave the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, and that since that time there has been a general statutory reservation of exclusive jurisdiction to the Federal courts in such cases, the question as to the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts has arisen in a number of cases, because Congress, by purporting to confer concurrent jurisdiction upon the state courts over certain crimes or offenses, has as to them withdrawn the restriction previously imposed.

It would seem that the question of the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts over this class of cases must be determined by the same criterion that governs in civil cases—namely, the inherent power of the state courts, unaided by the acts of Congress except so far as they may remove restrictions previously imposed upon such jurisdiction by Congress. The answer, however, is likely to be different in view of the general rule that the courts of one sovunder both the acts of 1851 and 1894 is general and absolute. By the former the liability "shall in no case exceed," and by the latter "shall be limited to" the value of the individual owner's interest in the vessel. The former provision is contained in § 3 of the act of 1851, and by § 4 it is provided that whenever the loss is by several owners of goods, etc., and the whole value of the vessel and freight is not sufficient, they shall receive compensation in proportion to their respective losses, and the owner of the vessel may take appropriate proceedings in any court for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which he is liable among the parties entitled thereto. It then continues that it shall be sufficient compliance by the owner with the requirements of the act if he shall transfer his interest in the vessel and freight to a trustee for the parties entitled, to be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction, and thereupon all claims and proceedings against the owner shall cease. There is nothing in this section which in any way changes the positive character of the limitation. The provisions are manifestly in furtherance, not in restriction, of the vessel owner's right, and are directory only, in the sense that they point out a method by which his right may be enforced, but are not exclusive of other methods which may be found effective for the same purpose. And such eighty will not execute the criminal or penal laws of another, whereas there is no such rule in respect to purely civil actions.

Justice Story, in Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 337, 4 L. ed. 105, says that no part of the criminal jurisdiction of the United States can, consistently with the Constitution, be delegated to state tribunals.

If by this he means, cannot be delegated by Congress, he is in accord with the later decisions, but most of the latter have determined the question of the state court's jurisdiction by reference to the criterion mentioned.

Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, is not authority for the position that Congress may effectively confer concurrent jurisdiction upon state courts over offenses against the Federal laws. It merely held that the Federal militia laws which covered the offense in question in that case did not confer exclusive jurisdiction upon the Federal courts, as was done by the judiciary act with reference to other offenses. This fact, under the doctrine established by the case with reference to concurrent jurisdiction, left the way open for the state court to take jurisdiction if it could find authority to do so independently of any act of Congress, and in that particular case authority was found in a state statute.

The existence of such statute differentiates the case from most of the other criminal cases involving the question of concurrent jurisdiction, since in such cases it was necessary to determine the inherent jurisdiction of the state courts by reference to the general principles of law.

State v. Wells, 2 Hill, L. 687, held that the state court had jurisdiction of a prosecution for opening a letter contrary to the act of Congress regulating the postoffice department.

The court quotes the provision of the Constitution making the laws of Congress the supreme law of the land, and says that an offense against the laws of the United States is an offense against the laws of the state, and the state has a right to punish it upon the principle of the common law that she has the right to punish all violations of her law. This decision was, however, expressly overruled by State v. McBride, Rice, L. 400, holding that the state court had no jurisdiction of an offense of stealing a letter from the mail in violation of the act of Congress, and is opposed to the current of authority.

Com. v. Feely, 1 Va. Cas. 321, denies the jurisdiction of the state court over a defendant indicted for stealing mail.

In these cases the judiciary act opposed no obstacle to concurrent jurisdiction, since the statute creating the offenses purported to confer such jurisdiction.

holds that the judicial power which Congress cannot vest in the state courts does not include the power to take affidavits, or to arrest and commit for trial offenders against the United States, and accordingly holds that § 4598 of the Revised Statutes is not unconstitutional because it authorizes justices of the peace to issue warrants to apprehend deserting seamen, and to deliver them up to the master of their vessel.

A similar decision, based on the same principle, had been previously made in Ex parte Gist, 26 Ala. 156.

Cases in which the defendants are proceeded against under the Federal statutes are to be distinguished from those like Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 410, 12 L. ed. 213; State v. Pike, 15 N. H. 83; Moore v. Illinois, 14 How. 13, 14 L. ed. 306; Com. v. Fuller, 8 Met. 313, 41 Am. Dec. 509; and Jett v. Com. 18 Gratt. 939,—in which there was a state statute covering the same offense as the Federal statute.

Penal laws.

Haney v. Sharp, 1 Dana, 442, denied the jurisdiction of the state court over an action for a penalty under the act of Congress relating to the census. The court says that no state tribunal has inherent jurisdiction over, nor can it take jurisdiction of, a penal case arising under an act of Congress, unless some law of the commonwealth has given it the right to do so, and the general government has by an act of Congress also consented. In this case neither of such requisites existed.

United States v. Lathrop, 17 Johns. 4, denied the jurisdiction of the state court over an action of debt by the United States to recover a penalty for selling spirituous liquor in violation of an act of Congress of August 2, 1813, which expressly provides that suit may be prosecuted before any court of the state having jurisdiction in like cases. The court says that a pecuniary penalty for violation of an act of Congress is as much a punishment for an offense against the laws as if a corporal punishment had been inflicted, and that as regards crimes and offenses the government of the United States stands in the same relation to the state government as any foreign government.

Justice Bradley, in Claffin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833, supra, says that if an act of Congress gives a penalty to a party aggrieved without specifying a remedy for its enforcement there is no reason why it should not be enforced, if not provided otherwise by some act of Congress, by a proper action in state. He refers to United States v. Lathrop, 17 Johns. 4, and remarks that the state courts have in certain instances declined to exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon them, but that that fact does not militate against the existence of such jurisdiction. He also criticises we understand to be the construction settled by the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the case of The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24, sub nom. National Steam Nav. Co. v. Dyer, 26 L. ed. 1001, it was said by Bradley, J.: "The primary enactment in § 4283, Rev. Stat., is that the liability of the owner for any loss or damage . . . shall in no case exceed the amount or value of his interest in the vessel and her freight then pending. Two modes for carrying out this law are then prescribed,—one in § 4284, and the other in § 4285." These sections are the revision and re-enactment of § 4 of the act of 1851 just discussed. The same opinion then proceeds to show that these modes are in aid, and not in restriction, of the owner's right to limit his liability, and are not therefore exclusive, but the defense may be made in any form that the nature of the case and the procedure of the court will permit. And to the same effect are Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 578, 594, 27 L. ed. 1038, 1044, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379, 617, the tendency to regard the laws of the United States as emanating from a foreign power, saying that it is founded on an erroneous view of the nature and relation of the state and Federal governments. It is to be observed, however, that Claflin v. Houseman, if regarded as an action for a penalty, was for the benefit of an assignee in bankruptcy, and not for the benefit of the government. Moreover, Justice Gray, in Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 36 L. ed. 1123, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224, says, arguendo, the courts of the state cannot be compelled to take jurisdiction of a suit to recover a penalty for a violation of a law of the United States, and that the only ground ever suggested for maintaining such suits in a state court is that the laws of the United States are in effect the laws of each state. After remarking that the statement of Justice Bradley in Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833, on this point was obiter, he says that Justice Bradley, the year before, when sitting in circuit (Ex parte Bridges), said it would be manifest incongruity for one sovereign to punish a person for an offense against the laws of another.

Jackson v. Rose, 2 Va. Cas. 34; Davison v. Champlin, 7 Conn. 244; and Ely v. Peck, 7 Conn. 239,—are to the same effect as United States v. Lathrop, 17 Johns. 4, supra.

On the other hand, United States v. Smith, 4 N. J. L. 33; Buckwalter v. United States, 11 Serg. & R. 193; Hartley v. United States, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 45; and Stearns v. United States, 2 Paine, 300, Fed. Cas. No. 13,341,—uphold the jurisdiction of state courts over suits by the United States to recover penalties under acts of Congress which purport to confer jurisdiction upon the state courts. These decisions rest on the ground that the laws of Congress are the supreme laws of the land, and the last-mentioned case alludes to the fact that the proceeding was not a criminal prosecution, but a civil action to recover a penalty for breach of the statute.

That case also disapproved of United States v. Lathrop, 17 Johns. 4, and dissented from the view that the Federal and state governments are to be considered as entirely foreign to each other, and that the case falls under the rule that the courts of one sovereignty will not take cognizance of, and enforce, the Penal Code of another.

In addition to the distinction suggested in Stearns v. United States, 2 Paine, 300, Fed. Cas. No. 13,341, with reference to the form of proceeding for the enforcement of a penalty, there seems to be a further distinction, depending upon the question whether the injury is solely to public, or directly affects private rights. Actions against national banks to recover the penalty for exacting usury are of the latter kind, and it has been generally held that state courts have jurisdiction of them, the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts having been negatived by the provisions of the acts of Congress purporting to confer concurrent jurisdiction upon the state courts.

To that effect are Kinsler v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, 58 Iowa, 728, 13 N. W. 59; Henderson Nat. Bank v. Alves, 91 Ky. 142, 15 N. W. 132; National Bank v. Johnson, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 904; Bank v. Snyder (Pa.) 2 Leg. Rec. Rep. 356; Ordway v. Central Nat. Bank, 47 Md. 217, 28 Am. Rep. 455; First Nat. Bank v. Overman, 22 Neb. 116, 34 N. W. 107; Morgan v. First Nat. Bank, 93 N. C. 352; Schuyler Nat. Bank v. Bollong, 37 Neb. 620, 56 N. W. 209; Hade v. McVay, 31 Ohio St. 231; Lebanon Nat. Bank v. Karmany, 98 Pa. 65; First Nat. Bank v. Gruber, 91 Pa. 377; Blets v. Columbia Nat. Bank, 87 Pa. 87, 30 Am. Rep. 343; Lynch v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 22 W. Va. 554, 46 Am. Rep. 520.

The opinion in Blets v. Columbia Nat. Bank, 87 Pa. 87, 30 Am. Rep. 343, cites, and relies on, Claflin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. ed. 833, and says that whatever doubts have been expressed by some state courts as to penalties to be sued for by the United States, or someone in its behalf, in order to vindicate the Federal law, they do not extend to a case involving a private right sued for by the citizen for himself.

The jurisdiction of the state courts, even over such actions, has been denied in Missouri River Teleg. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 74 Ill. 217, which says that the state court cannot enforce the criminal or penal laws of another sovereignty. In answer to the argument based on the fact that the state courts entertain jurisdiction in cases where national banks are parties either plaintiff or defendant, the court said that the jurisdiction in such cases resulted from the power conferred by the state Constitution and laws, and not from the acts of Congress.

Newell v. National Bank, 12 Bush, 57, was an action by a national bank on a note. The defendant pleaded usury, and sought to set off the forfeiture declared by the acts of Congress in such cases. The court held that the penalties arising under the laws of the United States could not be enforced in state courts.

National Bank v. Eyre, 52 Iowa, 114, 2 N. W. 995; Peoples v. First Nat. Bank, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 748; and First Nat. Bank v. Childs, 130 Mass. 519, 39 Am. Rep. 474,—on the contrary, hold that such forfeiture is available as a defense in a state court. It will be observed that § 5198, U. S. Rev. Stat., which prescribes the penalty for usury, provides for its recovery in an action of debt; so that actions for this penalty are civil in form, and the benefit accrues to the individual.

Whatever may be the rule when the action is for the vindication of a private right, or when the proceeding is not criminal, it is undoubtedly true, in the absence of state legislation, that the state courts cannot find in their own inherent powers, and cannot acquire through acts of Congress, the requisite authority to enable them to entertain a proceeding, criminal in its nature and designed for the vindication of a purely public right, to enforce a criminal or penal statute of the Federal government.

G. H. P.

and Craig v. Continental Ins. Co. 141 U. S. 638, 35 L. ed. 886, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 97. The very point of the admissibility of this defense in an action in a state court was decided in the case of The Rosa, 53 Fed. Rep. 132, where a petition by the vessel owner for establishment of limited liability, and for prohibition of further proceedings by a plaintiff in a state court, was dismissed by the district court of the United States on the ground that the defense could be adequately made in the state court. It is true that this conclusion has been dissented from in Quinlan v. Pew, 5 U. S. App. 382, 56 Fed. Rep. 111, 121, 5 C. C. A. 438, but apparently on the ground that the vessel owner's privilege, not only to have the value of the vessel appraised and his liability limited to that, but also to have all parties compelled to come in to the admiralty court with their claims, was absolute under the statute, and could not be refused, in view of the want of power of the state court to enforce the latter branch of the remedy. But even this case does not sustain the contention that the vessel owner may not make his defense in the state court if he so chooses. We are of opinion that appellant's right to make this defense is clear, and we see no difficulty in enforcing it in this action. They should have been permitted to show the value of the tug, and their respective proportions of ownership in it. The most convenient practice then would be, after appropriate instructions to the jury, to direct them, if they found for the plaintiff, to find specially, in addition, the value of the tug, and the proportionate ownership of the several defendants. With these facts specifically found, the verdict could be molded by the court into proper form with less danger of mistake than if the whole were left in a lump to the jury.

The questions of defendant's negligence, and Loughin's own contributory negligence, could not, under the evidence, have been taken from the jury.

A number of questions are raised by the assignments of error in regard to irregularities in the swearing of the jury, and in the verdict and judgment; but, as all of these will be easily avoided at the next trial, it is not necessary to discuss them.

1. One not a party, but having an interest in the subject-matter of a pending action, that may be adversely affected by the suit, will be permitted by the court, upon a proper showing, under Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 273, to come into the case for the protection of whatever right or interest he may have in the subject-matter.
2. A provision in an ordinance authorizing a street railway to be laid, that the space between the tracks shall be paved in the manner specified "when and as the street may be" thus paved, must be understood to mean that the paving between the tracks shall be at the expense of the company.
3. The construction which the parties themselves place upon a contract will be adopted by the court, when its terms are uncertain.
4. A mortgagee of a street-railway company, though not bound by a compromise contract between the mortgagor and the city, with respect to liens on the property for paving, cannot accept the benefit of such contract for the relief of the property from a lien existing under the company's charter ordinance without being subjected to the burden of a lien which the contract provided for.

5. A street railway is within the reason of the rule of a court of equity which subjects proceeds of mortgaged railway property in the hands of a receiver to the payment of current debts made in the ordinary course of business, if there has been any diversion of the current receipts to increase the value of the security.
6. A preference of a claim for paving the track of a street railway out of the proceeds of the property on foreclosure cannot be allowed on account of the purchase by the company of cars and other equipment after the paving was begun, materially increasing the value of the mortgaged property, unless such equipment was paid for out of the current earnings of the company.
7. A lien upon a street railway for a paving assessment to which the company is subject under its charter is superior to the lien of a mortgage upon the property.
8. A judgment on demurrer to an intervening petition, which makes a final disposition of the case so far as concerns the petitioners, may be appealed from.

(December 12, 1899.)

APPEAL by interveners from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wayne County dismissing a petition by creditors for intervention in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on defendant's property, in which interveners sought to obtain payment for material furnished for improvements which defendant was required to make. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. C. Fox, William L. Taylor, and A. C. Lindemuth for appellants.

Messrs. Seddon & Blair and John L. Rupe, for appellees:

The appellants' petitions give them no standing in court. They are not intervening petitions as recognized by the statutes, nor are they cross-complaints.

One who attempts to intervene in an action pending between other parties, without bringing himself within the provisions of the statute, is a mere interloper.

Des Moines Ins. Co. v. Lent, 75 Iowa, 522, 39 N. W. 826.

Treating the intervening petitions as cross-complaints, they must be tested by the rule of pleadings applicable to such complaints.

A pleading cannot serve the double purpose of an answer and a cross-complaint. It must be the one thing or the other.

Thompson v. Tookey, 71 Ind. 296; Washburn v. Roberts, 72 Ind. 213; Conger v. Miller, 104 Ind. 592, 4 N. E. 300.

Even as against the Richmond City Railway Company there can be no lien on the property of the company, unless the compromise ordinance is shown to be binding upon the company; for no lien can arise under the franchise ordinance alone.

The mere passage of the compromise ordinance did not make a contract.

Admitting that the compromise ordinance did become a valid and binding contract between the city and the company, a lien could be fixed by the city on the property of the company, only in exactly the same way that it could be fixed on the property of the abutting owners.

Before any assessment could have become a lien upon any property, or before anyone could have been affected by the proceedings, notice must have been given.

McEnaney v. Sullivan, 125 Ind. 407, 25 N. E. 540.

The general allegation that such proceedings were taken as required by law, even if the statement was not explained by setting out in the petition exactly what was done, is a mere allegation of law, and not a statement of any fact.

Oldfield v. New York & H. R. Co. 14 N. Y. 310.

If the city and the company ever intended to construe the franchise ordinance at all, or to give it any such construction, it was not in their power to give to it, after the mortgage was executed, any construction prejudicial to the rights of the bondholders, or in any manner to affect the rights of the bondholders without their consent.

Jones, Corporate Bonds, § 416.

A pleading stating a cause of action must proceed upon a single definite theory; it will be construed, and its theory determined, from its general scope and allegations; and the pleader will be held and conclusively 48 L. R. A.

bound by the theory upon which he proceeds in all stages of the cause.

The doctrine that a mortgage can be defeated by, or made inferior to, subsequent obligations incurred by the mortgagor, has never received judicial sanction except in a peculiar and limited class of cases.

There is a "broad distinction" between property to which the doctrine has been applied and the property which is the subject of this action.

A railroad is for the use of the universal public in the transportation of all persons, baggage, and other freight; a street railway is dedicated to the more limited use of the local public, for the more transient transportation of persons only, and within the limits of the city.

Louisville & P. R. Co. v. Louisville City R. Co. 2 Duv. 178.

A street railroad or "tramway," as it is sometimes called, whether propelled by mule or electric power, is a matter of purely local concern.

In no sense are these enterprises any more public institutions than are waterworks companies, gas companies, electric-light companies, or telephone exchanges.

The rule in Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 339, is not to be applied in case of a waterworks company, and the principles upon which the rule rests make it inapplicable in case of a street-railway company, or other merely local enterprise of that class.

There was no diversion of the current earnings, either to the payment of interest or the permanent improvement of the property. In fact but little interest was ever paid on the bonds.

One holding a mortgage debt upon a railroad has the same right to demand and expect of the court respect for his vested and contracted priority as the holder of a mortgage on a farm or lot.

Hadley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Richmond City Railway Company had operated a railroad over the streets of the city of Richmond for many years with animal power, and in March, 1889, the city council passed an ordinance granting the company a new franchise for the period of fifty years, and authorizing the company to operate its street railroads by means of cable, electric, or animal power, "or either or any of them" upon the conditions recited in the ordinance. The company accepted said ordinance as amended April 22, 1889, reorganized thereunder, and in January, 1890, to secure its 200 $1,000 bonds, executed to the now appellees its mortgage or all its property and "all rents, profits, tolls, issues, and income derived or arising therefrom." In 1892 it was deemed necessary and expedient by the common council of the city to pave with vitrified brick three squares of Main street, and, having adopted a declaratory resolution and ordinance therefor, gave notice to the Richmond City Railway Company to pave between its tracks on said squares "when and as the street was improved." The company failing to comply with the notice, the city paved between the tracks when and as the street was paved, and upon completion of the work charged against the company the actual cost thereof, namely $3,011.30, and demanded payment. The company failed and refused to pay the demand. Thereafter, in April, 1893, the city, desiring to pave with brick twelve additional squares of Main street, entered into what is termed a "compromise settlement" with the street-car company of all disputes and liabilities of the company to pave between its tracks, and in the settlement agreement it was specifically stipulated, as declared by ordinance and acceptance thereof in writing, that the city should remit its claim of $3,011.30 for the pavement already constructed, and that the company should thereafter pay for all such improvements between its tracks, if the cost thereof should be assessed against its property under the provisions of the Barrett law; the same to become a lien, and be enforced in the same manner as such assessments are enforced against abutting property owners. After the agreement, in the summer of the same year, twelve squares of Main street were, by process of law, paved with brick. The work was performed and materials furnished by the Standard Paving Company under a contract it had with the city for that purpose. The actual and reasonable cost of paving between the company's tracks, for the twelve additional squares, was $13,177.00, which was assessed against its right of way and property for payment in twenty successive semiannual payments, in pursuance of the compromise agreement. It was stipulated in the contract between the city and the Standard Paving Company that the city should be liable, on account of said improvement, only for the cost of so much of the same as bordered on public grounds and for the crossings of streets and alleys, as provided by the ordinance and laws of this state. The railway company refused to pay any part of the sum so assessed against it for pavement between its tracks. The Standard Paving Company purchased the brick used in the improvement of said twelve additional squares from the Royal Brick Company and the Canton Brick Company, appellants herein, and as part payment therefor the Standard Company duly assigned in writing to said appellants all its interest in the claim against the street-railroad company for paving between its tracks for the said twelve squares. Whatever rights and equities the Standard Paving Company acquired against the railroad company or its property by reason of said improvements were held by the Royal and Canton Brick Companies at the time of filing their petition of intervention. The company having made default in the payment of its obligations secured by its said mortgage, the mortgagees—being the appellees in this case—brought their action in the Wayne circuit court for the foreclosure of their mortgage and the appointment of a receiver, to which action the Richmond City Railway Company, the city of Richmond, and the Standard Paving Company, among many others, were made parties defendant. It was alleged in the complaint that the Standard Paving Company was claiming to hold a lien against the mortgaged property paramount to the mortgage lien of the plaintiffs, which was unfounded; and the paving company was made defendant, and required to assert its lien, if it had any. The default in payment of the street-car company was alleged. The company voluntarily appeared, and filed answer; and a receiver was appointed, qualified, and took full possession of the mortgaged property upon the same day the complaint was filed. Pending the formation of issues between the various parties, the appellant Royal and Canton Brick Companies, without objection from appellees, obtained leave of court to file their intervening petition and become parties to the action of foreclosure. The petition set forth with much detail the facts stated above, and particularly the franchise ordinance, the acceptance and reorganization thereunder, the adoption of electricity as a motive power, the paving of Main street with brick, notice to the railway company to pave between its tracks when and as the street was improved, its failure and refusal to do so, the doing of the work by the city, the assessment of the actual and reasonable cost thereof to the railway company, its refusal and failure to pay the same, the compromise agreement between the city and company, the performance of the conditions by the city and the nonperformance by the company; that the Standard Paving Company, as contractor with the city, did the work and furnished the materials in the paving of the twelve squares of Main street; that the Standard Company purchased of these interveners all the brick used in paving said twelve squares, and in part payment therefor duly assigned to them in writing—which assignment is filed therewith—all rights and equities held by it against the street-car company; that the actual and reasonable cost of paving between the tracks of the railway for the distance of the twelve squares was $13,177.90, which is due and unpaid; that under its contract with the Standard Paving Company the city is not liable for any part of said sum of $13,177.90.

that, after the execution of the plaintiff's mortgage, the railway company purchased and added to the mortgaged property in machinery, equipments, and track extensions, property and improvements of the value of $65,000. Prayer: That in any judgment or decree that may be entered herein the claim of these petitioners may be held a just lien upon the mortgaged property of the Richmond City Railway Company, and that, upon sale thereof upon decree of this court, the claim of these petitioners be ordered first paid, after payment of costs, out of the proceeds of such sale, and for all further proper relief. The city of Richmond, appellant, also filed an intervening petition, for the use of the Royal Brick Company et al. The plaintiffs filed a demurrer to the petition of the Royal Brick Company et al.: First, for insufficiency of facts; and, second, for defect of parties, in this,—that the Standard Paving Company was not made a party defendant. The plaintiff's demurrer was sustained, and the interveners refusing to plead further, and electing to stand by their petition, the court rendered judgment upon the demurrer against them, from which they appeal.

As shown by the briefs, the intervening petitions of all the other appellants have been fully settled out of court, and "the intervening petitions of the Royal Brick Company et al. and of the city of Richmond are based upon the same right, seek to enforce the same claim, and are substantially set forth in the same words." We will therefore consider only the questions arising upon the brick company's petition. It is first claimed that the appellants have no standing in court; that they came in neither by complaint, cross-complaint, nor answer; and that there is no such pleading known to our Code as an "intervening petition." While the Code does not, in terms, recognize an intervenor as a party litigant, yet this court has many times recognized in a party the attributes of an intervenor in equity. Barner v. Bayless, 134 Ind. 600, 603, 33 N. E. 907, and 34 N. E. 502, and cases cited; State v. Union Nat. Bank, 145 Ind. 544, 44 N. E. 585. It is the spirit of our Code to settle in a single action the rights and equities of all persons interested in the subject-matter, and to simplify the rules of practice and pleading as far as the same may be done with due regard to the just determination of the controversy. To accomplish this end, therefore, one not a party, and having an interest in the subject-matter of a pending action that may be adversely affected by the suit, will be permitted by the court, upon a proper showing, under § 273, 1 Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, to come into the case for the protection of whatever right or interest he may have in the subject-matter. Voorhees v. Indianapolis Car & Mfg. Co. 140 Ind. 220, 39 N. E. 738; Zumbro v. Parnin, 141 Ind. 430, 40 N. E. 1085. And his pleading, as in this case, is neither a cross-complaint nor an answer, and hence not subject to the objections urged. It seeks neither to set up a cross action against the plaintiffs, nor to bar their right of recovery. The petitioners are interested in the subject-matter of the suit. Without intervention, the property may be sold, and pass forever beyond their reach. It is now in the custody of the law. The plaintiffs seek its sale and application to the payment of their debt. The common debtor and subject-matter are before the court, and the only relief sought is that, if the sale of the property is ordered, the equities of the interveners in the funds arising therefrom may be enforced against the plaintiffs. There can be no doubt of the remedy thus afforded a stranger to the suit to enter, by leave of court, for the timely protection of his interests; and a petition of intervention need not be as formal as a complaint, and is sufficient in form if it contains a succinct and definite statement or recital of the facts upon which the equities claimed are predicated. Empire Distilling Co. v. McVulka, 48 U. S. App. 578, 77 Fed. Rep. 703, 23 C. C. A. 415. Appellees have suggested no specific infirmity in the facts alleged, and we are unable to discover any. The objection that the city of Richmond was not a party to the petition is unavailing under the demurrer as presented, and it is not urged that the Standard Paving Company, the petitioners' assignor, was a necessary party.

But it is earnestly urged that the ordinance conferring upon the Richmond City Railway Company the right to occupy the streets of the city of Richmond, exhibited with the petition, imposed no duty upon the railway company to pave between its tracks, and hence no lien, either preferential or specific, was created in the interveners' assignor for the construction of such pavement. With this contention we are unable to agree. In considering the question, it must be borne in mind that the following propositions of law have been by this court declared settled in this jurisdiction, viz.: (a) That a charter granted by a city, and accepted by a railway company, constitutes a contract between the city and company; (b) that such a charter must be strictly construed against the company; (c) that such company has no doubtful rights under such charter; (d) that where there are doubts they must be construed against the grantee and in favor of the city. Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 128 Ind. 530, 10 L. R. A. 770, 26 N. E. 188, 28 N. E. 88; State ex rel. Keith v. Michigan, 138 Ind. 455, 408, 37 N. E. 1041; Indianapolis v. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. 140 Ind. 107, 116, 27 L. R. A. 514, 39 N. E. 433.

The first section of the franchise ordinance provides that permission and authority are hereby granted and fully vested in the Richmond City Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to lay, construct, operate, and maintain a single or double track street railroad, with all the necessary and convenient tracks, etc., in and upon all the streets and alleys of said city, subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned, to wit:

Sec. 2. The motive power of said street railroad shall be cable, electric, or animal.

Sec. 3. The tracks of said railroad shall be so laid as to conform to the established grade of the streets, and in such manner as to be no unnecessary impediment to the ordinary use of the streets and the passage of wagons or other vehicles along and across the tracks.

Sec. 5. If the railroad is operated by electricity, the streets, wherever disturbed, obstructed, or damaged by reason of the construction, repair, or existence of said railroad, shall be by said company properly restored to the same condition as they were prior to such disturbance, and so maintained for one year thereafter.

Sec. 6. The sidewalks, curbs, or gutters disturbed or injured in the erection of poles or wires shall be by said company promptly restored and maintained for one year.

Sec. 7. All tracks shall be laid in the middle of the street.

Sec. 8. The center and cross wires shall at no point be at less elevation than 18 feet above the rails.

Sec. 9. The curb poles shall not exceed 22 feet in height.

Sec. 10. The poles shall not be nearer together than 125 feet, with possible variations to avoid interference with shade trees and ingress and egress of property owners.

Sec. 11. The poles shall be straight, smooth, and painted.

"Sec. 12. (As amended April 22, 1889). In case electric power is used, the rail may be T rail, and the street shall be graveled, paved, or macadamized up flush with top of rail upon the outside thereof when and as the street may be graveled, paved, or macadamized upon which the same are laid, and the street between the rails shall be graveled, paved, or macadamized when and as the street may be graveled, paved, or macadamized upon which the same is laid, upon a level with the top of the rail, and as near to the rail as the same can be done, leaving sufficient space only for the flange of the wheel, and so maintained; and, in case animal power is adopted as the motive power, a flat rail shall be substituted on or before September 1, 1889, on Main street, from Fourth street to Twenty-First street, and on North Eighth street from Main to North E street, and as far east on North E street as Tenth street. Said street railway shall have the right to extend its tracks in Glen Miller Park as now laid, as the said street railway and the committee on parks of said city may hereafter agree, subject to the approval of council."

"Sec. 17. Said Richmond City Railway Company hereby agrees to save said city harmless from any damage, loss, or liability occasioned by the construction, maintenance, or operation of said electric or other street railroad."

It is manifest from the foregoing conditions that it was the intention of the city, in granting authority to occupy its streets for private gain, to relieve the public, so far as possible, from inconvenience in the use of the streets, and from increased burden in their repair and maintenance. This is made clear by § 3, which prescribes how the tracks shall be laid, and by §§ 5 and 6, which provide that, wherever the streets, sidewalks, curbs, or gutters may be disturbed or damaged by the construction of the railroad, the company shall promptly restore the same to as good a condition as before the disturbance. And what warrant have we for saying that things affixed to a grant as conditions to its enjoyment are not conditions at all, but covenants of the grantor? Furthermore, how may we single out from a class of statements, phrased in the same tense, and alike impersonal as to the party of performance, and say some are covenants of the grantor and some conditions imposed upon the grantee? Yet this is what we are urged by the appellee to do. It is not claimed by appellees that the franchise ordinance imposed upon the city the duty of electing the kind of motive power to be used, as stated by § 2; nor of laying the company's track to conform to the established grade of the streets, as described in § 3; nor of erecting and painting its poles, as directed by §§ 10 and 11; nor of stretching its wires not less than 18 feet above the track, as required by § 8. But they do insist that it imposed upon the city the duty of paving between the company's tracks when and as the street is improved, as required by § 12; the insistence of appellees being that § 12 should be construed as merely declaratory of the mode of construction between the tracks that the city should thereafter observe when and as the street was improved upon which the track was laid. If it was the intention that the city should pave between the tracks, what reason was there for a specific covenant to do the work when and as the street was improved? Was it at all likely that the city would choose to do it at any other time? And, in the use of electricity, what concern should the railway company feel about the pavement between its tracks, whether graveled, macadamized, or bricked, or whether it was paved at all? And no reason is apparent, and none is suggested, why the city would voluntarily assume an obligation to pave in a particular manner, and at a particular time, in a contract that would conclude it for fifty years. Besides, the reading of the charter ordinance as a whole, and a consideration of the granting section, with the peculiar and uniform "shall be" in the enumerated conditions, upon which the grant is stated to depend, in the light of the rules of construction above announced, leads to the firm conviction that the adoption of the construction invited by appellees would be to subject ourselves to the irresistible construction that all the things enumerated as conditions of the grant are really covenants of the grantor. And this is not to be thought of. It must be said that they are all one or the other, and to doubt is to construe them against the company. It is also a familiar principle that, when the terms of a written contract are uncertain, the courts will adopt that construction which the parties themselves place upon it. Vinton v. Baldwin, 95 Ind. 433; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 118 Ind. 170, 20 N. E. 711; Pate v. French, 122 Ind. 10, 23 N. E. 673; Ingle v. Norrington, 126 Ind. 174, 25 N. E. 900; Vincennes v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 132 Ind. 114, 16 L. R. A. 485, 31 N. E. 573.

Much space is given to the discussion of the effect of the compromise ordinance of 1893, described in the early part of this opinion, upon the charter ordinance of 1889; but we fail to perceive its importance to the questions involved in this appeal. It does not repeal the charter ordinance of 1889, which supports and limits appellees' mortgage, either in terms or by implication. In fact, it is in aid of the charter by expressly declaring in its prefatory clause that it is "by way of a full settlement and compromise of said dispute;" that is, a full and final settlement and understanding of the extent of the company's liability under its charter of 1889. It was a definition of the franchise ordinance, not a repeal. It was nothing more nor less than an agreed construction of a disputed provision, and one which the court would be bound to adopt as between the parties. But, being subsequent to the execution of the mortgage to appellees, and without their approval, it was, as to them, nugatory. The mortgagees continue to hold the property as they received it from the mortgagor; and they received it in all respects as it was held by the mortgagor at the time the mortgage was delivered. The mortgagor had, therefore, no power to charge the mortgaged property by an unwarranted construction of its charter, nor impose any burden upon the security that did not exist at the time of the mortgage. Hence appellants must find support for their claim under the charter ordinance of 1889, or they have nothing to rest it upon. On the other hand, the compromise ordinance of 1893, being a contract between the city and the mortgagor with respect to the latter's rights and liabilities under its charter, the appellees, as mortgagees, must accept their mortgagor's contract as a whole, or reject it altogether. They cannot have the benefits without the burdens; that is to say, they cannot accept their mortgagor's unauthorized contract to relieve themselves from appellants' preferential claim under the charter ordinance of 1889, and repudiate it to avoid the specific lien fixed upon the mortgaged property by the same instrument. The new contract provides: "Said Richmond City Railway Company hereby agrees to pay all the cost of paving between the rails of its tracks on the residue of said Main street from the west line of Fourth street to the west line of Sixth street, and from the east line of Ninth street to the east line of Twenty-Third street: provided, said improvement is made under the provisions of the Barrett law;" and the estimated cost shall be assessed against the property of said company, "and, when adopted by the common council of said city, shall be and constitute a valid lien upon all the real estate, right of way, tracks, rolling stock, and machinery of said company." It is specifically alleged in the intervening petition, and admitted by appellees' demurrer to be true, that the city performed all the conditions of said contract on its part, improved twelve of the squares of Main street, as provided for in the contract, and also paved between the company's tracks pursuant to said agreement, at the actual and reasonable cost of $13,177.90, which amount was assessed against the company's property, payable in twenty semiannual payments, etc., in conformity to the provisions of the Barrett law, and that the company wholly failed and refused to pay the same. Accepting the new contract as a whole, the paramount lien and debt of $13,177.90 is admitted by appellees. Rejecting it as a whole, we must return to the ordinance of 1889, and dispose of this case as if the act of 1893 had not been ordained. The point made by appellees that the theory of appellants' petition is that their lien is specific under the ordinance of 1893, and not preferential under the charter act of 1889, and that they must be confined to their theory, cannot be accepted. If it is proper in any case—which we greatly doubt—for a court to arbitrarily declare a party's theory from his initial pleading, where the facts pleaded supply more than one, we are relieved of the task in this instance by the course of appellants' argument. Both ordinances are set forth in the petition at length; but the argument in this court, and which is entirely consistent with the pleading, goes to the effect and theory that the ordinance of 1893, designated by appellants as "supplemental" to the ordinance of 1889, should be accepted (1) as establishing a doubt in the charter as to the company's liability to pave between its tracks, and (2) as settling the doubt against the company by convention of the parties.

The most important question remains, namely, Does the petition exhibit such a claim as a court of equity will decree preferential payment from the proceeds of the mortgaged property? It is said in Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 339, by Waite, Ch. J., that "every railroad mortgagee, in accepting his security, impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts, before he has any claim upon the income." "The income out of which the mortgage is to be paid is the net income obtained by deducting from the gross earnings what is required for necessary operating and managing expenses, proper equipment, and useful improvements. . . . While, ordinarily, this power is confined to the appropriation of the income of the receivership and the proceeds of moneyed assets that have been taken from the company, cases may arise where equity will require the use of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property in the same way." It is alleged in the petition that, after the execution of the mortgage, and after the commencement of the improvement of Main street, the company purchased and added to its property, machinery, dynamos, motors, street cars, and electrical apparatus to the value of $50,000, and extended their tracks to the value of $15,000. This material increase in the value of the mortgaged property is also admitted by the demurrer. And it is further said, with respect to such acts, in Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 254, 25 L. ed. 339: "Under such circumstances it is easy to see that there may sometimes be a propriety in paying back to the income from the proceeds of the sale what is thus again diverted from the current debt fund in order to increase the value of the property sold. The same may sometimes be true in respect to expenditures before the receivership. No fixed and inflexible rule can be laid down for the government of the courts in all cases. Each case will necessarily have its own peculiarities, which must, to a greater or less extent, influence the chancellor when he comes to act. The power rests upon the fact that in the administration of the affairs of the company the mortgage creditors have got possession of that which, in equity, belonged to the whole or a part of the general creditors. Whatever is done, therefore, must be with a view to a restoration by the mortgage creditors of that which they have thus inequitably obtained." The rule is restated by the same eminent jurist in Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776, 783, 28 L. ed. 596, 599, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 675, 679, as follows: "That, if current earnings are used for the benefit of mortgage creditors before current expenses are paid, the mortgage security is chargeable in equity with the restoration of the fund which has been thus improperly applied to their use." There has been no departure in any of the cases cited. It has been adhered to and reaffirmed in them all. The rule has been applied only to railroad companies, and it is earnestly insisted that a street railway is not within the reason of the rule. It is said to operate in the administration of railroads on account of the public character of such institutions, and upon the assumption that they are of public concern. And that a suspension of operation will work an actual detriment to the public. We cannot see how the effect of suspension will be different. Both are transportation companies, both common carriers; and, if suspension in the operation of the one will be an injury to the general public, the suspension of the other will be an injury to the local public, and the difference is one of degree, and not of kind. The doctrine rests upon the principle of mutual benefit to the public, the mortgage and general creditors. If the value of the security is maintained, the system must be kept a going concern; and whatever is essential to this end in labor, repairs, or equipment must be protected by the highest degree of confidence to avoid the mischiefs of suspension. But there can be no restitution where there has been no diversion; that is to say, where there has been no taking of the earnings needed for the payment of current obligations, and applied in the betterment of the mortgaged property, there is nothing to be restored. And he who invokes the rule must show affirmatively that the mortgage creditors have got that which, in equity, belongs to the petitioner. If the mortgagor increases the value of the mortgaged property from sources other than the earnings, the fact supplies no equity in the general creditor. In this case it is not averred in the petition that the purchase of the electrical equipment, cars, etc., was made from the current earnings of the company, and for the absence of such averment the petition must be held insufficient to bring the claim within the rule just considered. Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776, 28 L. ed. 596, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 675.

Back of the question is another principle. Every right the railway company has in the city of Richmond rests upon the franchise ordinance. It has no power to run a car, collect a fare, or encumber its road in any way, except subject to this ordinance. The obligation to pave between its tracks is of the essence of its being, and can no more be laid aside than its duty to pay its debts. It is written in its charter, and inseparable from it; and when the mortgagees accepted their security they were bound to take the property as they found it, and bound to know that the rights they acquired in the property were subject to the burdens already imposed upon it. The right the appellants seek to enforce is more than a general claim for money, for it is a right blended with the right of the mortgagor to occupy and use the streets, and one which the mortgagees were required to take notice of and estimate in the acceptance of their mortgage. The liability does not rest upon a claim against the mortgagor, but upon the duty which arises out of the occupancy of the streets. In Midland R. Co. v. Fisher, 125 Ind. 19, 8 L. R. A. 604, 24 N. E. 756, the owner of land conveyed, in 1873, to a railroad, a right of way. It was incorporated in the deed, as a consideration, that the company should construct a board fence on each side of the railroad as soon as completed. The road was completed in 1876. In 1875 the company mortgaged all its property, and in 1883 the mortgage was foreclosed, and property sold thereunder. The purchaser entered into possession, and began the operation of the road. No fence had been constructed, and in 1886 the owner of the land brought suit against the purchaser, and in disposing of the case the court says: "The appellant is in the possession of the right of way as the grantee of the original contractor, and it must take the benefit it enjoys subject to the burden annexed to it by the contract which gave existence to that benefit. It cannot enjoy the benefit and escape the burden, for the burden and the benefit are so interlaced as to be inseparable. The 48 L. R. A.

right to the benefit is so blended with the burden that equity and justice forbid a severance. One who takes a privilege in land to which a burden is annexed has no right to assert a claim to the privilege and deny responsibility for the burden. A party who acquires such a privilege acquires it subject to the conditions and burdens bound up with it, and must, if he asserts a right to the privilege, bear the burden which the contract creating the privilege brought into existence. In Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Power, 119 Ind. 269, 21 N. E. 751, we said of a railroad company: 'Holding the land under the deed, as it did, it was bound to perform its contract. To permit it to retain the land and repudiate the deed would be against equity and good conscience.' In this instance the covenant written in the deed was an essential part of it, and the agreement to construct the fence was part of the consideration for the land. The case is near akin to that of a suit to enforce a vendor's lien, for here the deed upon its face exhibited the contract, and the facts open to observation showed that the covenant had not been kept. The facts open to observation did more than put the appellant upon inquiry; but, had they done no more than put it upon inquiry, it could not justly claim the rights of a purchaser without notice. It must be held that the covenant in the deed through which the appellant claims, and the facts open to observation, imparted notice of the covenant, and notice, also, of its nonperformance." As before said, the right does not rest against the person, but it is affixed to the thing, and the mortgagees or their grantees may not have the thing without the obligation to discharge the right, for the right runs and abides with the property wherever it goes. We think, therefore, that the petition of intervention exhibits sufficient facts to show that the charter of the mortgagor company required it to pave between its tracks when and as the street was improved, as a condition to its enjoyment, and that the condition was carried into appellees' mortgage, and that the claim of the petitioners, arising thereunder, is paramount to the lien of the mortgage.

Finally, it is objected that a judgment on demurrer to an intervening petition is not such a final judgment as may be appealed from. The judgment appealed from makes a final disposition of the case so far as concerned the petitioners, and was sufficient to warrant the appeal. Voorhees v. Indianapolis Car & Mfg. Co. 140 Ind. 220, 39 N. E. 738.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer of appellees to the intervening petitions of the Royal Brick Company et al., and of the city of Richmond, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Rehearing denied.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

HENDERSON TRUST COMPANY, Admr., etc., of Mary H. Berner, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

John H. STUART.

(.....Ky.....)

1. The failure to apply for an extension of a vacancy permit for premises that are still vacant at the expiration of the time for which such a permit has been granted with an agreement by the insurer to extend the time on application therefor constitutes negligence on the part of an executor or administrator with the will annexed, who is in possession of the premises and of the policy of insurance thereon, which will make him liable in damages in case the property is destroyed by fire and the insurance cannot be collected because of the failure to procure the extension of the vacancy permit.

2. The negligence of an executor in failing to apply for an extension of a vacancy permit for insured premises which continue vacant, which had been granted with an agreement to extend it on application, is held to be a question of law for the court.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henderson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to hold defendant liable for the value of a house destroyed after defendant had negligently permitted the insurance to lapse. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Yeaman & Yeaman, for appellant:

The failure to insure property, or keep it insured, is not such negligence as, in case of loss, will render the administrator or any trustee liable for its value.

Underhill, Trusts, 4th ed. pp. 253, 255, and note.

Mr. Montgomery Merritt for appellee.

Burnam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first error relied on by appellant for a reversal of the judgment rendered against it in the trial court is that the court erred in overruling its general demurrer to the petition of appellee.

The petition sets forth, in substance, that Mrs. Stuart sold a house and lot to Mary H. Berner, and took notes for the purchase money, retaining a lien for their payment, and that under the contract of sale, as further security for the purchase money, Mrs. Berner insured the house against loss by fire in the sum of $2,000, and had the policy made payable to Mrs. Stuart as her interest might appear; that shortly after the sale, Mrs. Berner died, and that appellant, the Henderson Trust Company, qualified as her administrator with the will annexed, and also as guardian of Mary Wilke, the devisee of the house and lot under the will of Mrs. Berner, and that it took possession of the property and also of the policy of insurance under an agreement with appellee that it would look after both; that the house became vacant in violation of the terms of said policy, and, to prevent the avoidance of the policy, the appellant procured from the insurance company on the 1st day of April, 1890, a "vacancy permit" for thirty days, and it is alleged that the insurance company agreed that if the property was still vacant at the expiration of the thirty days the permit would be extended for an additional thirty days upon application; that the house was still vacant at the expiration of the "vacancy permit," but that the appellant neglected to ask for or to procure an extension thereof, and that in fourteen days after the expiration of the thirty days allowed, the house was burned and became a total loss; that the appellant trust company sued the insurance company, making appellee a party defendant, and that recovery was defeated on the ground that "the policy had become void by reason of the aforesaid vacancy." And it is insisted that appellant was negligent in permitting the house to remain vacant, and in failing to ask for an extension of the "vacancy permit," and that it is liable for the damages accruing by reason of such negligence.

It is insisted for appellant that the allegations of the petition are insufficient to support a cause of action, because there is no allegation therein that the insurance company was under any obligation to carry the insurance while the property was vacant, or to have granted a request for an additional "vacancy permit" if it had been made; that, under the averments of the petition, the insurance company was under no legal obligation to have extended the "vacancy permit," even if it had been applied for, and that a recovery should not be permitted upon a mere speculation or surmise as to what it might have done gratuitously if application had actually been made to it.

It is the duty of an executor or trustee to preserve the estate in his hands, and to protect it from loss; and he has ordinarily the power to do whatever may be necessary for that purpose. While he is not the guarantor of the safety of the property, he is held to such care in the management of the estate as a competent person would ordinarily exercise under the same circumstances in reference to his own affairs (see Messmore v.

Stone, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 596; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 944); and the Henderson Trust Company owed the same duty to protect the property and preserve it from injury and destruction that a careful person would ordinarily have exercised under the same circumstances if the property had belonged to him. There is no statute in this state which requires an executor to insure real estate in his hands against loss by fire, and the failure to take out such insurance is not necessarily such negligence as in case of loss will render the executor or trustee liable for its value, but is a question to be determined from the facts of each particular case; and the cost of the insurance, the value of the property, its liability to destruction by fire, and whether or not the executor had money in his hands that could have been used for that purpose, are the cardinal elements to be considered. But in this case no money was needed. The insurance had already been paid, and all that was necessary on the part of the defendant to keep the policy alive was that it should have made application to the insurance company for the extension of the "vacancy permit," and it seems to us that the failure of the appellant to make such application was such negligence in the care of the property as to make it liable for the injury resulting therefrom. In the answer filed by the Henderson Trust Company there is no denial of the averments of the petition that the "vacancy permit" would have been extended upon application, and that no application or effort was made to get same done; and the president of the company frankly admits in his testimony that the failure to make application for the extension of the "vacancy permit" was due to an oversight of the clerk in the company's office who had charge of these matters. The demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

Negligence or the absence of care is always a question of fact for the jury when there is a reasonable doubt as to the facts or inferences to be drawn from them, but when the facts are either admitted or established by undisputed testimony, it is the duty of the court to declare the law applicable to them. See Field, Neg. § 519; Ashland Coal & I. R. Co. v. Wallace, 101 Ky. 637, 42 S. W. 744, 43 S. W. 207.

In this case we have these facts admitted in the pleadings: That appellant, as executor, took charge of the policy of insurance and property, and it became vacant in violation of the provision of the policy; that a vacancy permit was granted for thirty days, and the insurance company agreed that it would be extended upon application at expiration if desired, and that this application was not made on account of the oversight and negligence of the appellant company; and that the property was destroyed and the loss of the insurance was directly attributable to such negligence. Under these circumstances; we think it was the duty of the court to declare, as a matter of law, that appellant had not exercised such care in the management of this property as a competent person would ordinarily have exercised under the same circumstances with reference to his own property. This is in substance the effect of the instruction given in this case, and upon the whole facts we are of the opinion that appellant has not been prejudiced.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Charles F. JOHNSON, Assignee, etc., of Edward Ware,
v.

John H. EVELETH.

(.....Me.....)

1. A log-driving company's possession of logs in a river while driving them, not as agents of the person to whom they have been sold and are being sent, but by virtue of the charter of the company, although all owners of logs driven by it are made members of the company by force of the statute, does not constitute the possession of the person to whom they are being taken, so as to preclude the stoppage of the logs in transitu by the seller.
2. Logs in a river being driven by an incorporated log company, though it is not a common carrier but has a duty under its charter of driving the logs and the possession of them so far as the logs are susceptible of possession, are subject to the right of stoppage in transitu in favor of a person who had sold them and had delivered them in the river for the purpose of their being driven to the purchaser's booms and mill.

3. A contract for the delivery of logs "over the dam" at the outlet of a lake into a river, whence they are to be driven by a log-driving company down the river to the booms and mill of a purchaser, does not make the dam the final destination or place of delivery of the logs, so as to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu while they are being driven down the river.
4. Constructive possession of a mass of logs being driven down a river to the booms and mill of a purchaser does not result in his favor, so as to terminate the right of stoppage in transitu, by the fact that a few of the logs have actually floated down to his mill and been received by him.

NOTE.—On the subject of stoppage in transitu, see Farrell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (N. C.) 3 L. R. A. 648, and note; Fenkhausen v. Fellows (Nev.) 4 L. R. A. 732; Kingman v. Denison (Mich.) 11 L. R. A. 847, and note; and Jeffris v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Wis.) 33 L. R. A. 851. 48 L. R. A.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Kennebec County for the opinion of the full bench, of a suit to recover the value of certain logs which had been sold by defendant to Ware and stopped in transitu. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Johnson, for plaintiff:

If Mr. Ware knew, or had reasonable grounds for believing, that he was insolvent when these logs were purchased, that would not afford a legal reason for a rescission by the defendant of the contract of sale.

Burrill v. Stevens, 73 Me. 395, 40 Am. Rep. 366.

If the logs were stopped by the defendant by virtue of his right of stoppage in transitu, there was no rescission of the contract of sale.

Newhall v. Vargas, 13 Me. 93, 29 Am. Dec. 459; Vargas v. Newhall, 15 Me. 314, 33 Am. Dec. 617.

If defendant rescinded the contract because of fraud practised by Mr. Ware, he cannot avail himself of this second ground of defense.

The right of stoppage in transitu could not be exercised in this case, because the place of delivery specified in the contract of sale had been reached and the transit was at an end when the logs were turned over the dam at the east outlet of Moosehead lake, and they were then in the constructive, if not actual, possession of Mr. Ware.

Muskegon Booming Co. v. Underhill, 43 Mich. 629, 5 N. W. 1073.

A company charged with the duty of driving logs is not a common carrier.

Mann v. White River Log & Booming Co. 46 Mich. 38, 41 Am. Rep. 141, 8 N. W. 550.

The original direction given to these logs by the defendant had been fully complied with when they had been towed across Moosehead lake to the dam at the east outlet, and turned over the dam.

Brook Iron Co. v. O'Brien, 125 Mass. 446; Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 70; Dixon v. Baldwin, 5 East, 175; Guilford v. Smith, 30 Vt. 49; Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 307, 23 Am. Dec. 607; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 913; Aguirre v. Parmelee, 22 Conn. 473; Sawyer v. Joslin, 20 Vt. 172, 49 Am. Dec. 768.

Some of these logs had reached Mr. Ware's boom at Winslow before his assignment, and a delivery of part of an entire parcel or cargo, with an intention on the part of the vendor to take the whole, terminates the transitus, and the vendor cannot stop the remainder.

Mr. Harvey D. Eaton for defendant.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes up on report. We think the evidence shows the following facts: On March 22, 1898, one Edward Ware entered into a contract of bargain and sale with the defendant for the purchase of about 1,000,000 feet of logs, numbering 7,663 sticks, then lying in Spencer pond, above Moosehead lake. It was agreed that the logs should be delivered by the defendant "over the dam" at 48 L. R. A.

the east outlet of Moosehead lake into Kennebec waters. From that point they were to be driven down the Kennebec river by the Kennebec Log-Driving Company. Ware had booms in Fairfield and Winslow, and a mill at the latter place. The logs were bought by Ware for the purpose of being manufactured into lumber at his mill in Winslow. On May 25, 1898, Ware assigned to the plaintiff for the benefit of his creditors, under the provisions of the insolvent law (Laws 1897, chap. 325, § 16). He was, and for a long time had been, hopelessly insolvent. In the meantime the defendant had caused a large portion of the logs to be delivered "over the dam" at the east outlet, and they were being driven down the Kennebec river towards Ware's booms and mill. Some scattering logs had already reached Ware's mill, and had been sawed. They had drifted down the river, without the necessity of being driven. But the drive proper did not reach Fairfield or Winslow until the last of August, 1898. When the drive reached Shawmut, above the Fairfield boom, August 22d, the defendant took from the river all the logs he had sold to Ware which then remained in the drive, numbering 6,815 sticks, and surveying 808,032 feet. And it is for this taking and alleged conversion that the plaintiff has brought this action of trover. Ware agreed to give four notes for the price of the logs, maturing at different times. At the time of his assignment he had given one note to the defendant, which was subsequently protested for non-payment, and then tendered back by the defendant to the plaintiff. The other three notes he never gave.

The defendant asserts several grounds of defense, only one of which do we think it necessary to consider. He says he took the logs from the river in the exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu. He claims that the log-driving company was a carrier. He says he sold the logs on credit, and that while they were in transit to their ultimate destination in Winslow, and were in the possession of the log-driving company as a carrier, the purchaser became insolvent. And this fact, he says, gave him the right to resume the possession of the logs at any time before they came into the actual possession of Ware, or came to their destination in Winslow.

In reply the plaintiff says: (1) That the log-driving company was not a carrier, or middleman, in such a sense as gave it possession or control of the logs; that the river was the real carrier; that the company provided no means of conveyance or motive power, but simply facilitated the floating of logs down the river by breaking jams and otherwise, and hence that, after the logs passed out of the possession of the defendant by being turned "over the dam," they must have been, constructively at least, in the possession of Ware, while floating upon the river; and, furthermore, that in any event the log-driving company was really only an association of log owners, of whom Ware was one, and that a delivery of the logs to the company was, in effect, a delivery into the possession of Ware. (2) That by the terms of the contract between Ware and the defendant the "destination" of the logs was "over the dam" at the east outlet, and that when they were so delivered the transitus was at an end. And (3) that the facts that some of the logs had floated down the river to Ware's mill, and had been received and sawed by him, constituted a constructive delivery of the whole mass into his possession.

These contentions make it necessary for us to consider the character and duties and method of operation of the Kennebec Log-Driving Company. Its charter and by-laws are made a part of the case. By the charter (Laws 1865, chap. 402), certain persons named, their associates and successors, are constituted "a body politic and corporate," and may sue and be sued, etc. They have power to adopt all necessary regulations and by-laws. "They shall drive to such place of destination on the Kennebec river as may be designated by the owners, or by the directors of said company, and may secure and form into rafts, under rigging, all logs and other timber belonging to said company, or any member thereof, that may be in the East Branch and Kennebec river, for that purpose, below the outlet of Moosehead lake at the dam." "They may remove obstructions, and erect booms, piers, and dams." Section 1. "Any person, persons, or corporations, or their agents, owning logs or other timber to be driven on said rivers at the date of the annual meeting in each year, shall be members of the Kennebec Log-Driving Company, and shall so continue for two years at least from that date." Section 3. Members owning logs to be driven are required to file a correct statement of all such logs or timber, giving the number of feet, with the marks, and the place from which logs are to be driven, and their destination. The expenses of driving, and for damages and losses, are to be assessed upon the owners of the logs driven, and the payment of assessments is secured by a lien upon the logs. Section 4. The company may collect logs or timber remaining in booms or in any place exposed to loss, and deposit the same in suitable places, and properly secure it from loss, and to pay for this service an assessment may be made. Sections 10, 11, 12, 13. "The private property of each member of said company shall be holden to pay all debts contracted by the company after he became a member thereof, and before his withdrawal from the same, in default of company property whereon execution may be satisfied." Section 16.

By these extracts from its charter it appears that the Kennebec Log-Driving Company is a corporation. It is more than a mere association of log owners. To be sure, all owners of logs to be driven are, by force of the statute, members, but all combined are only one corporate body. The corporation and its members are different persons. Hence it follows that a possession by the corporation is not a possession by a member, unless the corporation has been made an agent for that purpose. In this case the corporation does not appear to have been the agent of Ware for any purpose. It was simply performing its corporate duty in receiving and driving the logs. It did that under its charter, and not as agent. In this respect this case is unlike Muskegon Booming Co. v. Underhill, 43 Mich. 629, 5 N. W. 1073, cited by the plaintiff. There the logs in question had failed to get into the booming company's main drive, and had been left in the rear. The vendees engaged the booming company to send back and get the logs, which they did. The vendees having become insolvent before the logs reached their mill, the vendor, Underhill, sought to exercise the right of stoppage in transitu. The court denied this right, but rested its decision on the ground that the vendor, by his contract or acquiescence, "virtually offered possession to [vendees] . . . and that they [the vendees] accepted the offer, and virtually took possession by having the logs taken into custody, at their expense and on their account as owners, by the booming company." Our conclusion is, therefore, that the possession by the log-driving company was not possession by Ware.

The next question in this connection is, May the right of stoppage in transitu attach to logs being driven as these were? We have no doubt that it may. It may be conceded that the log-driving company is not a common carrier, although in some respects its duties are analogous to those of common carriers (see Mann v. White River Log & Booming Co. 46 Mich. 38, 41 Am. Rep. 141, 8 N. W. 550, where the distinction is pointed out); but that is not decisive. When a vendor sends goods sold to the place of destination by private conveyance, the right of stoppage in transitu exists the same as if they are sent by common carrier. The vital question is, Are they in transit between the vendor and the vendee? The right of stoppage in transitu is merely an extension of the lien for the price which the vendor has after contract of sale and before delivery of goods sold on credit. The term itself implies that the goods are in transit, and that they have not come into the possession of the vendee. It permits the vendor to resume possession before the goods sold have come into the vendee's possession, if the latter has become insolvent. Whether they are in the possession of a carrier, strictly so called, while in transit, or whether they are in possession of a "middleman," is immaterial. 2 Kent, Com. 702. In this case the logs were certainly in transit between the dam at the east outlet and Ware's mill. They were moving down the river. They were kept moving by the agency of the log-driving company. The company broke the jams, cleared the eddies and the banks of logs, took them wherever they became stranded, and drove in the rear. The company having assumed the duty of driving the logs, no one else had the right to interfere with the driving. So far as a mass of logs in a river is susceptible of possession, to that extent the log-driving company was in possession of these logs for the purpose of transporting them. And we think that was sufficient. It certainly accords with the equitable principles out of which the right of stoppage in transitu has grown. Newhall v. Vargas, 13 Me. 93, 29 Am. Dec. 489. The character of the possession of the log-driving company is only important as it shows that the logs had not come into the possession of the vendee, and were still in transit.

But the plaintiff next contends that, so far as this case is concerned, the transitus ended when the logs were turned "over the dam" at the east outlet, because, he says, that was the ultimate destination of the logs, within the meaning of the contract of purchase; that the defendant's agreement was to deliver the logs there; and that, when the logs were so delivered, the transitus contemplated by the contract was at an end; and that in any further transit the right of stoppage in transitu would not exist. This might be true if by any fair construction of the contract, read in the light of surrounding conditions and circumstances, we could understand that the dam was really the contemplated final destination of the logs, or that the logs were to be delivered at the "dam," and there remain subject to further acts or directions of Ware. Becker v. Hallgarten, 86 N. Y. 167. But we cannot interpret the contract so narrowly. We must view the situation as the parties did. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that these logs, at the time of the contract, were above the dam, and above a portion of Moosehead lake; that they were brought to be manufactured in Ware's mill in Winslow; that they must float or be driven down the river all the distance between those points; that it was expected that they would be driven by the log-driving company; that there was no place of deposit at the "dam" for keeping the logs, but that the transit in the lake above the dam and in the river below was actually continuous, the dam being simply the point where the defendant ceased to drive and the company began. In view of these circumstances, should "over the dam" be regarded as the "destination" of the logs? We think not.

The question here is not whether the turning of the logs "over the dam" was a delivery,—such a delivery as would have vested title in the vendee, in case delivery was necessary. It is not a question of title. We assume that Ware had the title to the logs. The defendant bases his right of stoppage in transitu upon that fact in part. The exercise of that particular right presupposes that the title of the goods is in the vendee; and, further, the title remains in the vendee even after the exercise of the right. The title is not changed. Hurd v. Bickford, 85 Me. 217, 27 Atl. 107. The question here is whether, by the delivery at the dam, the logs came into the possession of the vendee, and so far only as the delivery at the dam throws light upon this question is it material. The distinction, in a word, is that property sold may have been delivered so as to affect title, and yet not have come into the possession of the vendee so as to bar the right of stoppage in transitu. An illustration of this is found in the common class of contracts where the vendor agrees to deliver to a carrier designated by vendee for shipment to vendee's place of business. A delivery to a carrier under such circumstances vests title in the vendee, and places the goods subject to his risk, but the vendor does not lose his right of stoppage in transitu while the goods are in transit to the vendee. Grout v. Hill, 4 Gray, 361; Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 307, 23 Am. Dec. 607; Gibson v. Carruthers, 8 Mees. & W. 321. In a case where goods were delivered to the purchasing agent of the vendees to be transmitted to the vendees' factory in another state, it was held that the right of stoppage in transitu was not barred. The court said that the delivery of the goods was to the agent, not as owner, nor as agent of the owners to dispose of them in any other way than to transmit them to the vendees' place of business, and that to take away the right of stoppage in transitu there must be an absolute delivery to the agent for the use of the vendees, and it must have been a full and final delivery, as contradistinguished from a delivery to a person acting as a carrier or forwarding agent to the principal. Aguirre v. Parmelee, 22 Conn. 473. To terminate the transitus by delivery to a middleman, it must be a delivery not to transport, but to keep. Guilford v. Smith, 30 Vt. 49. See our own case of Newhall v. Vargas, 13 Me. 93, 29 Am. Dec. 489. It was held in Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 67, that the transitus is not at an end until the goods have reached the place contemplated by the contract between the buyer and seller as the place of their destination.

As bearing upon the "destination" of the logs, the plaintiff, in argument, suggests that under the charter of the log-driving company the owner of the logs was required to file with the company a statement of their destination, which was not done, and also that the company does not itself take logs from the river, but the owners separate them from the general drive, and boom them, or take them out, at such points as they please. To these suggestions, it is a sufficient answer to say that it is clear that the intended destination of these logs was at Ware's mill, and that, whatever the rights of Ware to stop the logs, or take them out of the river, may have been, he did not exercise them. He did not take possession of the logs while they were in transit.

Finally, the plaintiff contends, inasmuch as some small portion of the logs had floated down to Ware's mill, and had been received by him before his assignment, that this put him in constructive possession of the whole mass, and terminated the transitus. We are unable to come to that conclusion. The surveyor's bill shows that there were 7,663 sticks in the lot of logs purchased. The defendant, when he took possession, found 6,815 sticks in the drive. It appears that some had gone below Ware's mill to Hallowell, and undoubtedly some sticks had been left behind upon the banks or in the eddies of the river. But assuming that the whole of the remaining 848 sticks had, during the season, floated down to or by Ware's mill, still we do not think that that fact constituted a constructive possession in Ware, or the plaintiff, of the logs which had not come down. It is not like the case where a vendee has taken some portion out of the whole mass, which was then susceptible of possession, and in which case he has thus obtained constructive possession of the whole. Such facts are important sometimes when it is necessary to decide whether a legal delivery has been made. But here, as we have said, it is not a question of technical delivery, but one of actual possession. Here Ware took only such scattering, floating logs as came to him. The remainder were not in his possession. They were still in the possession of the log-driving company. They were still being driven. They were still in actual transit. And we think the vendor had the right to stop them before that transit was ended. Such a conclusion gives effect to the spirit and purpose of the law. Buckley v. Furniss, 17 Wend. 604; Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co. 106 Mass. 87.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Otho L. SUMMERS et al., Appts.,
v.

Henry H. BEELER et al.

1. A restriction as to the building line, inserted in a deed, cannot inure to the benefit of a prior grantee of another lot on the same street, which is conveyed subject to the same restriction, when the grantor did not impose any servitude upon the land he retained, and the restrictions were not part of a general plan or scheme for the benefit of all the purchasers.
2. A general plan or scheme for the benefit of all the purchasers of lots sold on the same street, as shown by a recorded plat, does not appear from the fact that most of the lots are sold subject to the same restriction as to building line, where no restrictions are shown by the plat, and none are imposed on some of the lots that are first sold, while purchasers of some of the other lots have violated the restrictions upon them, and such violations have not been resisted by other purchasers.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Washington County in favor of defendants in a proceeding to enjoin defendants from erecting a building in violation of the restrictions contained in their title deeds. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel W. Doub and Frank B. Bomberger, for appellants:

The condition in the deed of Mrs. Beeler, and of all the lots from 6 to 13 inclusive, is an encumbrance upon the title.

NOTE.—For condition in deed as to building restrictions, see also Atty. Gen. v. Algonquin Club (Mass.) 11 L. R. A. 500; Hutchinson v. Ulrich (Ill.) 21 L. R. A. 391; and Chicago v. Ward (Ill.) 38 L. R. A. 849.

The restrictions in the deed of Mrs. Beeler and the other eight lots create easements or servitudes in favor of the other lots.

Sandorn v. Rice, 129 Mass. 396.

The plaintiff may enforce the condition in the deed of the adjoining lot belonging to Mrs. Beeler.

The mere fact that the original deed of the Summer's lot is prior in date to that of the original deed of the Beeler lot does not deprive Mrs. Summers of the right to enforce the condition in the deed of Mrs. Beeler.

Mr. A. C. Strite for appellees.

Pearce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed by the appellants to restrain the appellees from erecting upon their own premises, adjoining those of the appellants, a bay window, in violation, as the appellants claim, of restrictions contained in conveyances for their respective premises from a common vendor, to whom their titles are traced through mesne conveyances. A preliminary injunction was granted, and was dissolved upon hearing, and thereupon this appeal was taken.

Rev. C. L. Keedy being the owner of a tract of land in Hagerstown, on the east side of Mulberry street, laid out the tract into twenty-eight lots, fourteen of which fronted on Mulberry street, and fourteen extended back eastward, fronting on King street, as shown in the accompanying plat, which was recorded among the land records of Washington county, but without anything thereon, or in the description of the lots which accompanied the plat, to indicate any restrictions upon the use of the lots, or any of them. In the subsequent sale and conveyance of these lots fronting on Mulberry street, certain restrictions as to the building line to be observed were inserted in some of the deeds, while in others there were no restrictions whatever. Lots 1, 2, 14, 3, and 5 were the first sold, and in the order named, without any restriction as to their use. These conveyances were all made between June 28, 1838, and November 23, 1888. Lot 5 was conveyed to C. P. Mason and W. M. Keedy, and the first house built upon any of the lots was erected here in the spring of 1889, standing back 8 feet from the east line of Mulberry street. On No. 1, a church has been built, with a covered vestibule extending beyond the 8-foot line. On No. 2, three dwellings have been built, each with a two-story bay window extending beyond the 8-foot line. On lots 7, 10, and 14, houses have been built, each with a one-story front porch extending beyond the line. On lot 8 a house was erected in 1889, the front wall of which is on the 8-foot line, with an inclosed porch, making it a one-story bay window, extending beyond the line. All the other houses on the Mulberry street lots have steps extending beyond the 8-foot line. All these lots, except 1, 2, 14, 3, and 5, were sold and conveyed with substantially the same restriction as to building; that is, "that no building or other improvement shall be located, built, or constructed upon said lot closer to the west marginal line thereof than a line running parallel thereto, and bounding the west wall of the house owned by C. P. Mason and Wm. M. Keedy upon lot No. 5." No. 11 is owned by Mrs. Summers, one of the appellants; and No. 10, by Mrs. Beeler, one of the appellees, who is now building a house thereon, with a bay window extending 3 feet beyond the line of the Mason and Keedy house on No. 5, to which she is limited by the original conveyance of her lot No. 10, and the appellants are seeking to restrain the erection of this bay window. Lot 11 was originally conveyed to the Danzer Lumber Company by deed dated January 2, 1890, containing the restriction above mentioned; and the title thereto has passed to Mrs. Summers by mesne conveyances, each of which refers to the restriction in the original deed. Lot 10 was originally conveyed to Norman B. Scott by deed dated December 16, 1890, with the same restriction; and the title thereto has in like manner passed by mesne conveyances to Mrs. Beeler, each conveyance referring to the original restriction.

R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, and Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289, says: "These cases very conclusively settle the law that a grantor may impose a restriction in the nature of a servitude or easement upon the land that he sells or leases, for the benefit of the land he still retains; and if that servitude is imposed upon the heirs and assigns of the grantee, and in favor of the heirs and assigns of the grantor, it may be enforced by the assignee of the grantor against the assignee (with notice) of the grantee." The court observed that in each of the cases reviewed the grantor imposed the servitude upon the land he sold, in favor of the land he retained, while in the case then before the court the grantors imposed the condition upon the land they retained, in favor of the land they sold; but the court said "the principle is the same in both cases." But the case now before us does not fall within either class of cases mentioned. Mr. Keedy sold and conveyed the plaintiff's lot No. 11 January 2, 1890. He had then sold and conveyed eight lots (Nos. 1, 2, 14, 3, 5, 9, 8, and 6), the first five without restriction, and the last three with the restriction mentioned, and he imposed upon the grantee of lot 11 the same restriction; but he imposed no servitude upon the land he retained, which embraced lot 10, in favor of the land he then sold, lot No. 11. He sold and conveyed the defendant's lot No. 10 December 16, 1890, and he imposed the same restriction upon that lot which he had imposed upon lot 11. But this restriction cannot inure to his benefit, as respects lot 11, upon the principle stated in 69 Md., and 14 Atl., because he had sold lot 11 nearly a year before; nor can it inure to the benefit of the plaintiff, upon that principle, as owner of lot 11, because there is no privity either of contract or estate between the plaintiff and the defendant. In Mulligan v. Jordan, 50 N. J. Eq. 363, 24 Atl. 543, it was held that a purchaser of a lot, whose deed contains a covenant against the erection of any building within a certain distance of the curb line, cannot maintain an action against a subsequent purchaser of an adjacent lot from her grantor, for violation of a like covenant, when there was no such covenant between the two purchasers, and their grantor, although he required similar covenants from all purchasers, did not covenant with the first that he would exact them from subsequent purchasers. The chancery court of New Jersey is a court of high repute, and has dealt with numerous questions of this character; and the facts of the case cited above are so closely analogous to the facts of this case that we cannot do better than adopt the following language from that opinion: "The complainant's deed is prior to that of the defendant. There is no covenant to the complainant from Mr. Roberts, the grantor, that he holds the remainder of the property subject to the same restrictions, or that he will exact similar covenants from the purchasers of the remaining property; nor is the complainant the express assign of defendant's covenant with Mr. Roberts; nor is there any covenant between the plaintiff and the defendant. The right of an owner of a lot to enforce a covenant (to which he is not a party or an assign) restrictive of the use of other lands is dependent on the covenant having been made for the benefit of this lot. Obviously, while a subsequent purchaser might, by the operation of this rule, acquire a right of action against a prior purchaser, the prior purchaser would acquire no rights from a covenant entered into by a subsequent purchaser, unless there exists some condition which will entitle him to the benefit of such covenant."

The condition above mentioned has its illustration in another class of cases in which grantees from a common grantor, whose deeds contain restrictive covenants, conditions, or reservations, have been allowed to enforce them inter sese; that is, cases where, "although the covenant or agreement in the deed, regarded as a contract merely, is binding only on the original parties, yet, in order to carry out the plain intent of the parties, it will be construed as creating a right or interest in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament or an easement appurtenant to the remaining land belonging to the grantor at the time of the grant; . . . and the right and burden thus created will respectively pass to, and be binding on, all subsequent grantees of the respective lots of land." Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 365, 71 Am. Dec. 715, quoted and approved in 69 Md. 270, 14 Atl. 563. But, as is well expressed in Mulligan v. Jordan, 50 N. J. Eq. 363, 24 Atl. 543, "the right of grantees from a common grantor to enforce, inter sese, covenants entered into by each with said grantor, is confined to cases where there has been proof of a general plan or scheme for the improvement of the property, and its consequent benefit, and the covenant has been entered into as part of a general plan to be exacted from all purchasers, and to be for the benefit of each purchaser, and the party has bought with reference to such general plan or scheme, and the covenant has entered into the consideration of his purchase." In that case the court proceeded to say: "The only fact which appears . . . is that the same covenant is incorporated in the deeds of the complainant and defendant, and that Mr. Roberts has inserted the same covenant in each deed he made conveying any portion of the property. This has been held not to be sufficient evidence of the covenant having been entered into for the benefit of other lands conveyed by the same grantor,"—citing in support of this position Jewell v. Lee, 14 Allen, 145; Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass. 381; Keates v. Lyon, L. R. 4 Ch. 218; and Renals v. Cowlishaw, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 868. In the present case the facts are not nearly so strong as in Mulligan v. Jordan, because here Mr. Keedy conveyed five of the fourteen lots sold without any restrictions whatever.

In Nottingham Patent Brick & Tile Co. v. Butler, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 268, Justice Willis says: "The principle which appears to me to be deducible from the cases is that where the same vendor, selling to several persons plots of land, parts of a larger property, exacts from each of them covenants imposing restrictions on the use of the plots sold, without putting himself under any corresponding obligation, it is a question of fact whether the restrictions are merely matters of agreement between the vendor himself and his vendees, imposed for his own benefit and protection, or are meant by him, and understood by the buyers, to be for the common advantage of the several purchasers. If the restrictive covenants are simply for the benefit of the vendor, purchasers of other plots of land from the vendor cannot claim to take advantage of them. If they are meant for the common advantage of a set of purchasers, such purchasers and their assigns may enforce them, inter se, for their own benefit." That case was a sale of a parcel of land in 1865, in thirteen lots, to different purchasers, with covenant by each restricting the use of the land as a brickyard. Defendant subsequently bought lot 11, but his deed contained no restriction. In 1882 plaintiff contracted to purchase lot 11, and paid a deposit, but, on discovering the restrictive covenant, claimed to rescind the contract, and sued for the deposit; and it was held that, if the contract were executed, he would be bound by the restrictive covenants; that the owner of the other twelve lots could enforce them against him and each other, and that he was entitled to rescind and recover the deposit. On appeal Lord Esher, M. R., said Justice Willis was perfectly correct, and that "the question whether it is intended each of the purchasers shall be liable, in respect of those restrictive covenants, to each of the other purchasers, is a question of fact, to be determined by the intention of the vendor and of the purchasers, and that question must be determined upon the same rules of evidence as every other question of intention." In that case the property was put up at auction in 1865 in thirteen lots, and one of the publicly announced conditions of sale was that no lot should be used as a brickyard. At that time lots 1 and 2 were sold; in February, 1866, there was a second auction, at which lots 6, 7, and 8 were sold; and in October, 1867, there was a third auction, at which lots 9 and 10 were sold; and the evidence showed that all these were sold on the same terms. Lots 3, 4, and 5 were sold, respectively, in 1865, 1866, and 1867, at private sale; but there was no direct evidence as to the terms on which they were sold, the deeds for these not being produced. Lot 11 was sold at private sale September 4, 1866, and the deed contained the restrictions mentioned at the auction. Lot 13 was sold at private sale in June, 1866, with the same restrictions. These restrictions, among other things, required that all buildings erected should be of a uniform stone color, with slate roofs, and should cost not less than £400 each; and the proof was that every house built conformed to these conditions. Upon this state of proof, the court could reach no other logical or rational conclusion than that the vendor intended, and the purchasers understood, that the covenants should inure to the benefit of every purchaser, and that they entered into the consideration of every purchaser. But, in the case before us, though Mr. Keedy took the pains to record, before sale, a plat of the land, and a description of the lots, he nowhere mentioned any restrictions or conditions as to their use. There was no auction sale at which such restrictions or conditions were made known to the public, nor was such announcement made in any other manner. Not only so, but the five lots first sold were sold without any restrictions; and the purchasers of all the other eleven lots on Mulberry street (which were sold with restrictions), except Mrs. Summers, have treated these restrictions as not made for the common benefit of all these purchasers, both by their own violation of these restrictions, and by their failure to resist similar violations by the other purchasers. We think, therefore, the conduct both of the vendor and of the purchasers forbids the conclusions that their intent and understanding were that these restrictions were part of a general plan or scheme for the benefit of all the purchasers.

The cases chiefly relied on by the appellant do not sustain his contention in this case. Thus, in Tallmadge v. East River Bank, 26 N. Y. 105, a plat was filed and recorded, showing that every house to be built was to be set back 8 feet from the street. In Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 449, 26 Am. Rep. 615, an agreement showing restrictions as to all the lots was recorded, and the defendant's purchase was made with express reference and subject to this agreement. It was strenuously contended that the case of Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289, repudiated the necessity of a general plan in cases like the present, and having been approved by this court in 32 Md., and in 69 Md. and 14 Atl., sustained the appellants' contention. But we do not so understand that case. The language used by the court, and relied on here by the appellants, is as follows: "It was objected at the argument that this remedy applies only as a means of compelling an observance of the terms involved in a general plan of lots, and this element actually exists in about half of the cases just cited, yet they are not decided on that consideration. It is not because a plan is deranged that the court interferes, but because rights are invaded, or about to be; and this fact may exist in a plan of two lots, as well as in one of two hundred. The plan often furnishes the proof of the terms on which sales were made, but the fact of the alleged terms is as effective when proved by a single deed as when proved by a plan." It is manifest from this language that the Pennsylvania court is in full accord with the English chancery court in holding that the question is one of fact to be determined by the intention of the vendor and of the purchasers, and that it is to be determined upon the same rules of evidence as other questions of intention. In the Pennsylvania case there were but two lots under consideration, and the intention of the parties was as clearly shown by the one deed imposing restrictions upon one lot for the benefit of the other, retained by the vendor, as it could have been by a plan describing the two lots, and detailing the conditions to be imposed on one for the benefit of the other. The case of Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass. 381, is more closely analogous to the present case than any to which we have been referred. Heath laid out a parcel of land in eleven lots, five of which fronted on the north side of Gordon street, and one on the south side of the same street. A plat was recorded, showing the area and description of each lot, but making no reference to any restrictions upon their use. Three of the five lots on the north side of the street were conveyed by Heath, subject to the condition that no house should be built thereon within 20 feet of Gordon street. The other two lots on the north side and the one lot on the south side were conveyed without any restriction. The plaintiff's deed was prior in point of time to defendant's deed, and both were subject to the restriction mentioned. Defendant began the erection of a house within 20 feet of the street, and plaintiff applied for an injunction, which was refused, the court saying: "There is nothing from which the court can infer that the restriction contained in the deed from Heath to the defendant was intended for the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff. No such purpose can be gathered from the plan. . . . Neither of the deeds under which these parties respectively claim purports to give to the grantee any such right against any other grantee. . . . The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, if she insists upon giving to that condition any wider application, and this burden we do not find that she has sustained." A very elaborate and able review of all the leading American and English cases on this subject will be found in De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388, fully sustaining the conclusions of the learned judge of the circuit court.

For the reasons stated, the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs to the appellee in both courts.

1. A will giving a grandnephew an estate "for the purpose of securing to him a liberal education," requiring him to finish a collegiate course at one of two specified universities, and providing that the property shall pass from him if, "through his own disinclination or incapacity or the indifference of his parent or guardians, he should fall to carry out these intentions," with a further provision that until he is twenty-five years of age the property shall be held by a trustee, who shall "deliver over the property and estate into his hands and possession" when he is twenty-five years old if the directions of the will have been carried out; expressing also a special desire that the grand-nephew shall not sell a certain place until he shall attain the age of twenty-five years,—vests in him an equitable estate at the death of the testatrix, subject to be divested by the nonperformance of the condition imposed, which is a condition subsequent, and not precedent.

2. The death of a person while in college, thereby making it impossible to perform a condition subsequent imposed by will on an estate which was given him subject to be divested if he should fail to carry out the intentions of the will "through his own disinclination or incapacity or the indifference of his parent or guardians," will not divest the estate so as to prevent its descent to his heirs at law and next of kin, since the performance, becoming impossible by the act of God, is dispensed with.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the A Circuit Court of Baltimore City construing the will of Elizabeth E. Pike, deceased, adversely to plaintiffs' contention that, a life estate having terminated, a trust thereby created had ceased, and the property should be declared vested in the residuary legatees. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bernard Carter, John Prentiss Poe, S. Johnson Poe, and Edgar Allan Poe, for appellants:

In construing wills, courts always endeavor to ascertain what the intention of the testator is, and, when this intention is discovered, are guided and controlled by it.

The vesting is suspended where the suspension of enjoyment is for reasons personal to the legatee, and not for the convenience of the fund.

Bigelow, Wills, Student Series, p. 255.

An interest is vested, as distinguished from contingent, either when enjoyment of it is presently conferred, or when, if the enjoyment of it is postponed, the time of enjoyment will certainly come to pass. If the right of enjoyment is made to depend upon some event or condition which may or may not happen or be performed, the gift is contingent.

Bigelow, Wills, Student Series, p. 244.

The law favors the early vesting of estates, but the intention of the testator governs, and in ascertaining his intention the whole will must be regarded, and not particular expressions in it only; and if it appears that the condition annexed to the gift was for reasons personal to the legatee and related to the substance of the gift, so that it is to be presumed that without the condition the testator would not have made the gift, and especially where the event upon the happening of which the gift depends is uncertain, and does not relate to the arriving at a given age, then the gift is contingent, and the condition on which it depends is a condition precedent.

Scott v. West, 63 Wis. 566, 24 N. W. 161, 25 N. W. 18; Loder v. Hatfield, 71 N. Y. 98; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 456; Cropley v. Cooper, 19 Wall. 176, 22 L. ed. 113; Tayloe v. Mosher, 29 Md. 452.

Construing the 5th clause and the 11th clause together, it is made apparent that the testatrix intended to give the legatee only so much of the income as was necessary to secure him the liberal education in the mode prescribed by the time designated, that is to say, by his finishing his collegiate course at Harvard or Yale by the time of his arrival at the age of twenty-five years.

Pulsford v. Hunter, 3 Bro. Ch. 416; Leake v. Robinson, 1 Mer. 363.

If, for any of the reasons stated in the 5th clause, he did not graduate before reaching twenty-five years of age, the "money" appropriated for such purpose and not then expended was to pass away from him to the residuary legatees.

To give it to him before that event happened would palpably be to defeat the intent of the testatrix, which clearly was to make no absolute gift of the corpus, unless that event did happen.

Loder v. Hatfield, 71 N. Y. 98; Tayloe v. Mosher, 29 Md. 453.

The condition upon which alone his right of enjoyment was to depend was the fact of his graduating before reaching the age of twenty-five years.

Bigelow, Wills, p. 244.

Equity cannot relieve from the consequence of a failure to perform a condition precedent.

4 Kent, Com. 125; Davis v. Angel, 31 Beav. 223. Affirmed on Appeal, 4 DeG. F. & J. 524.

The contingency was annexed to the substance of the gift, and hence it is plain that the testatrix never meant to make absolute the gift to him unless the event, viz., his graduation, happened.

Tayloe v. Mosher, 29 Md. 452; Bigelow, Wills, Student Series, p. 257.

Messrs. William A. Fisher and Arthur Stewart, for appellees:

A condition will not be raised by implication from a mere declaration in the deed that the grant is made for a special and particular purpose, without being coupled with words appropriate to make such condition.

Kilpatrick v. Baltimore, 81 Md. 193, 27 L. R. A. 643, 31 Atl. 805; 3 Kent, Com. 130; Bigelow v. Barr, 4 Ohio, 358; Packard v. Ames, 16 Gray, 327.

A grant declared to be for a special purpose, without other words, cannot be held to be on a condition.

Kilpatrick v. Baltimore, 81 Md. 193, 27 L. R. A. 643, 31 Atl. 805.

The question whether a condition is antecedent or subsequent depends upon the order of time within which the performance is to occur.

Creswell v. Lawson, 7 Gill & J. 240.

And "if the thing to be done does not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate in 43 L. R. A.

the grantee, but may accompany or follow it, and may as well be done after as before the vesting of the estate, the condition is subsequent."

A strict construction is applied to conditions subsequent, adversely to the raising of a forfeiture, and the forfeiture must have occurred literally within the terms creating the condition.

Since James Pike Ellicott faithfully pursued the directions of the testatrix until his untimely death, the condition was performed.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By this appeal we are called upon to determine what estate, if any, was vested in James Pike Ellicott under the last will and testament of Mrs. Elizabeth E. Pike. He was the grandnephew of the testatrix, and in his fifteenth year at the time of her death, which occurred in 1891, a few months after her will was executed. He died intestate, in March, 1898, having been twenty-one years of age the December preceding his death. The will is divided into fourteen paragraphs, and the testatrix stated in it that it was written by herself. She first named the executor and trustee, then made a number of devises and bequests, and, after giving $10,000 to each of the four children of her brother William M. Ellicott, in addition to an interest in another fund, made them her residuary devisees and legatees. The paragraphs directly involved in this proceeding are the fifth, tenth, and eleventh, and are as follows:

"(5) I leave the rest of my Baltimore property to my grandnephew James Pike Ellicott for the purpose of securing to him a liberal education. He shall remain at some good preparatory school in the state of Massachusetts until he is fitted to enter either Harvard or Yale University, where he shall remain until he has finished the collegiate course. If, however, through his own disinclination or incapacity, or the indifference of his parent or guardians, he should fail to carry out these intentions, then the money which has been left to him for this purpose shall pass away from him entirely into the body of my estate."

"(10) I give and bequeath to my grandnephew James Pike Ellicott, in fee simple, all my real estate situated in the town of Robbinston, Maine, and also all furniture, plate, horses, carriages, boats, harness, by which I mean everything of every description that I own in the town of Robbinston, and not hereafter specially disposed of by me.

"(11) Provided, however, that all the estate and property devised and bequeathed by me to James Pike Ellicott shall be held by my trustee until the said James Pike Ellicott shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, in trust, to rent, manage, and take charge of the real estate, keep it in repair, pay taxes and expenses incidental thereto, also to keep the personal estate invested in good securities, and collect and receive all rents, increase, and interest accruing on said estate, and devote the net income arising therefrom to the special object mentioned above, viz., the education of James Pike Ellicott; it being my desire that he may be thoroughly prepared to enter into any profession for which he has inclination or capacity. All surplus income arising from the property given for his use by this my will, not required in the earlier years of his minority for his education and maintenance, to be carefully invested and accumulated for the later period of his minority, when his collegiate expenses will be increased. In case the above directions have been carried out, upon my said nephew James Pike Ellicott attaining the age of twenty-five years, I desire my trustees to deliver over the property and estate into his hands and possession. But I specially desire my said grandnephew not to sell the Robbinston place till he shall attain the age of twenty-five years, as it is my earnest wish to keep the property as long as possible in the family, and have it go with the name."

James Pike Ellicott graduated at a preparatory school in Massachusetts, and in the fall of 1896 entered the freshman class at Harvard. He was in the sophomore class when he died, but was still under some conditions, either as to his entrance into college or imposed afterwards. The testimony is not altogether clear about that, but it is not material. The question is whether, under this will, he had such a vested estate as descended to his heirs, or whether the property referred to passed to the residuary devisees and legatees named in the will. The court below decreed that the part of the estate of Mrs. Pike thus left young Ellicott became, at her death, vested in him, and at his death descended to his heirs at law, and directed the trustee to at once relinquish control over the same, the period during which he as trustee was directed to hold it having been terminated by the death of young Ellicott. From that decree this appeal was taken.

It may be conceded that the desire of the testatrix, most conspicuously made known in her will, was that this grandnephew, who was named after her deceased husband, should receive such an education and be so prepared for the battle of life that he would reflect credit upon him whose name he bore, 48 L. R. A.

although it does not follow that she was not in part influenced by her affection and regard for him. The testimony shows that she always took a very special interest in him, paid nearly, if not all, his expenses after he went to Adams Academy, and gave means from time to time for his benefit. He, at least, does not seem to have been in either of the classes of which she says: "I have not thought it necessary to divide my property among those who have received a larger amount from others than I can give to any. Still less have I cared to remember any who have shamefully and spitefully used me." Her idea undoubtedly was that the best way to provide for him was to have him properly educated; but that was not all, for, after he received the education contemplated by her, he was to have the corpus of the estate. If she had only been interested in his education, and had intended that the property set apart for him should be used for that purpose alone, then she could, and probably would, have directed that the corpus, on his arrival at the age of twenty-five years, should be otherwise disposed of.

But let us examine the will itself to ascertain the legal effect of the terms used therein, always keeping in mind the intention of the testatrix, so far as indicated by the will and such circumstances as we can properly consider. In paragraph 5 the language is, "I leave the rest of my Baltimore property to my grandnephew James Pike Ellicott, for the purpose of securing to him a liberal education;" in paragraph 10, "I give and bequeath" to him "in fee simple all my real estate situated in the town of Robbinston, Maine, also all furniture," etc.; and in the part that created the trust she said, "Provided, however, that all the estate and property devised and bequeathed by me to James Pike Ellicott" shall be held by the trustee until said Ellicott shall have attained the age of twenty-five years, "in trust," etc. The language thus used by the testatrix in making provision for him was not only sufficient to vest an equitable estate in him immediately upon her death, but, unless qualified by some other parts of the will, is absolutely conclusive of her intention to do so. The form of the gift "shows that a present, and not a future, estate was intended." Re Stickney, 85 Md. 103, 35 L. R. A. 693, 36 Atl. 654. She did not even "leave" or "give and bequeath" the property to the trustee for the use of her nephew, but, on the contrary, she not only devised and bequeathed it to the latter, but, in creating the trust and describing what the trustee should hold, she said, "all the estate and property devised and bequeathed by me to James Pike Ellicott." When the trustee was ready to enter upon the discharge of his duties, in order to ascertain what he was to hold, he was compelled to see what was thus devised and bequeathed to James. The gift of the Baltimore property, "for the purpose of securing to him a liberal education," did not, of itself, create a condition; for, as was said in Kilpatrick v. Baltimore, 81 Md. 193, 27 L. R. A. 645, 31 Atl. 808, "a condition will not be raised, by implication, from a mere declaration in the deed that the grant is made for a special and particular purpose, without being coupled with words appropriate to make such a condition," and the same principle applies to a devise or bequest. What, then, is there to be found elsewhere in the will to overcome the language used by the testatrix which so strongly indicates her intention to vest the property in her grand-nephew? The trust created by paragraph 11 was simply that the trustee should rent, manage, and take charge of the real estate, keep it in repair, pay taxes and expenses incidental thereto, also to keep the personal estate properly invested, and collect the interest, "and devote the net income arising therefrom to the special object mentioned above, viz., the education of James Pike Ellicott." The testatrix also provided for the investment and accumulation of any surplus income not required in the earlier years of his minority "for his education and maintenance," so it could be used when his collegiate expenses would be increased. There is therefore nothing in that to cast any doubt on her intention, so clearly previously expressed, as to his taking the estate. When she made her will, and indeed when she died, he was not yet fifteen years of age, and it was therefore eminently proper that the estate should be left under the control of a trustee until James reached his majority; and as she intended that the income should be used for his education and maintenance, and fixed twenty-five years of age as the time within which he was to complete his collegiate course, it was far better to at once name a trustee, instead of giving his guardian control, especially as his father was her executor and trustee.

The only other provision in the trust which reflects upon the question we are to determine, besides what is in paragraph 5, of which we will speak presently, is "In case the above directions have been carried out, upon my said nephew James Pike Ellicott attaining the age of twenty-five years I desire my trustee to deliver over the property and estate into his hands and possession." The direction "to deliver over the property and estate into his hands and possession," in so far as it reflects upon the question whether the estate was intended by the testatrix to be vested in her nephew, indicates that it was. She did not direct him, under those circumstances, to convey property to her nephew, the title to which up to that time was not vested in him, but simply to deliver over and give the possession of "the property and estate;" which imports that she considered it already vested in him, but that he, up to that time, was to be kept out of the possession of the corpus. Nor did she make any provision for the trustee conveying it to any other person or persons if her directions had not been carried out. She therefore could not have supposed that the property was vested in the trustee, excepting such legal title as was in him by intendment of law, as would enable him to discharge his duties as such trustee. She certainly did not intend that, from the time of her death until the period when her grand-nephew would reach the age of twenty-five years, if he lived that long, the beneficial interest in the estate should be in the residuary devisees; for there is nothing in the will to suggest that, and as she devised nothing to the trustee, and the legal title was only in him by intendment of law, she must have intended that the equitable interest should be somewhere, and the only possible place indicated by her will where it should be, if not in the trustee, was in James Pike Ellicott, so long as he had not forfeited his right to it.

The provision, "in case the above directions have been carried out," undoubtedly refers to the directions contained in paragraph 5. They are that James shall remain in a good preparatory school in Massachusetts until he was fitted to enter either Harvard or Yale, "where he shall remain until he has finished the collegiate course. If, however, through his own disinclination or incapacity, or the indifference of his parent or guardian, he shall fail to carry out these intentions, then the money which has been left to him for this purpose shall pass away from him entirely, into the body of my estate." The latter part of the clause just quoted adds strength to the appellees' contention that the title to the equitable estate in this property vested in James at the death of the testatrix. It is that "the money which has been left to him for this purpose shall pass away from him entirely;" thus not only speaking of the money "which had been left to him," but when she said it "shall pass away from him" it seems to us that the necessary inference is that it was, in her opinion, in him, and hence could "pass away from him" upon his failure to carry out her intentions as therein expressed. At the argument the meaning of the word "money" in the connection in which it is used was discussed; the appellants contending that its usual and ordinary meaning should be given it, and that its use showed that the intention of the testatrix was not to give him any estate in the corpus unless and until he graduated, but only to give him in the meantime so much of the income as was necessary to enable him to become entitled to the corpus by the time he should arrive at the age of twenty-five years, by his graduation at or before that time. They say he took an equitable interest in the income, subject to the condition precedent that he should finish his collegiate course at Harvard or Yale by the time he arrived at the age of twenty-five years, and, if he graduated prior to that time, the equitable estate in the income, subject to such condition precedent, was to become a vested estate in the corpus, of which, upon his arrival at the age, he was to receive the actual possession, freed from the trust. Although the will furnishes some ground for the contrary contention, it may be conceded that the word "money," thus used by the testatrix, is equivalent to "income," and only meant that. In paragraph 3, in making certain provisions for her sister Rebecca, the testatrix apparently used the word in its ordinary sense, and she may have intended to do so in this paragraph. But we cannot admit that it at all follows that this use by her of the term "money" shows any intention on her part that he should not have a vested equitable interest in the estate. Until he was twenty-five he was only to have the possession and use of the income,—the money. That is all that owners of equitable estates in properties held by trustees usually have. There are, of course, cases in which they may have the enjoyment and use of the corpus; but if the legal title of real and personal property is held by a trustee for the beneficial use of another, who gets the income, the latter ordinarily has an equitable vested interest, which is liable for his debts, and, if not limited to life or some definite period, it will descend to his heirs at law or next of kin. Generally, if the interest from the investment of a fund or the profits of an estate be given by will, the devisee will take the fund or estate absolutely, although that does not obtain when the will shows a different intent (Cooke v. Husbands, 11 Md. 506); and we cannot see how this direction as to the money passing away from him can be any evidence of the intention of the testatrix not to give him a vested equitable estate, subject to be defeated by the nonperformance of the condition. "It makes no difference, as to the vesting, whether the legal estate be devised to trustees, who are required to convey according to the directions of the will, or whether the interest is provided to take effect without the intervention of trustees, nor that the trust provides for the accumulation of income until the period of payment or distribution arrives." Tayloe v. Mosher, 29 Md. 451. In this same paragraph, as we have seen, the testatrix had used language which imports an intention to make an absolute gift, as she afterwards did in the tenth paragraph as to the Maine property; and when she provided, in paragraph 11, that a trustee should hold the property in trust, to use the net income for the education and maintenance of her nephew, it would be placing a very narrow construction on the whole will to hold that she only intended to give him an equitable interest in the income until he graduated, and then such interest was to become a vested estate in the corpus.

The only causes of his failure to carry out these instructions, which should work the result mentioned, assigned by the testatrix, are "his own disinclination or incapacity, or the indifference of his parent or guardian." The one relied on by the appellants is his "incapacity," and they contend that his death, which prevented him from graduating, whatever he might have done if his life had been spared, is included in that term. But while it is true that the word "incapacity" may sometimes apply to physical as well as mental conditions, was it used by the testatrix in that broad sense? It was used in connection with the education of this young man,—with reference to his power to complete the collegiate course provided at Harvard or Yale. It was not a question whether he would have the necessary funds, for those she was providing, nor the inclination to study, as that was included by another term, but it evidently applied to his mental powers. If, while he was at the preparatory school, his teacher had said of him that he did not have the "capacity" to graduate at Harvard, would that have been understood to have referred to any other than his mental capacity? If when he entered Harvard it had been said, "He will fail to graduate by reason of his incapacity," would it have been thought to refer to his death before graduating? Of course, his death would cause him to be incapable of graduating; but that is not the term that would be used if it was meant that he would not graduate because he would die before doing so. If the testatrix had meant that "if for any reason whatever" he did not graduate he should forfeit the estate, it would have been easy to say so, and it is only reasonable to suppose that if she had intended that, if his death prevented his graduation, it should be forfeited, she would not only have said so in terms that would have admitted of no doubt, but she would probably have directed where it should go in that event. She did so in other instances, and she was evidently a woman of considerable intelligence, and with very decided convictions as to how her estate should go.

The concluding clause of paragraph 11, "But I specially desire my said grandnephew not to sell the Robbinston place till he shall attain the age of twenty-five years, as it is my earnest wish to keep the property as long as possible in the family, and have it go with the name," is relied on by the appellees. When that is taken in connection with the tenth paragraph, in which she gave him that property in fee simple, it certainly does afford some evidence of her intention that the property should be vested in him before he was twenty-five years of age; but if the appellants' theory was correct, that she intended him to have a vested equitable estate as soon as he graduated, although he was not twenty-five, it is possible that she might have for that reason placed that provision in the will; and therefore, in considering the question, we have not attached as much importance to it as might otherwise have been done.

Taking the whole will into consideration, our conclusion is that the testatrix intended to vest an equitable estate in the properties mentioned in her grandnephew at the time of her death, subject to be divested by the nonperformance of the condition imposed by her, which was a condition subsequent, and not precedent. In that conclusion we are supported by the settled rules of construction of wills and the presumptions of law. It undoubtedly favors the early vesting of estates, as has often been said by this and other courts, but nowhere more emphatically than in Tayloe v. Mosher, 29 Md. 450. The same words may be used to create a condition precedent as a condition subsequent, "but courts are averse to construing conditions to be precedent when they might defeat the vesting of estates under a will." Pennington v. Pennington, 70 Md. 442, 3 L. R. A. 822, 17 Atl. 333. "It is equally well settled that if the thing to be done does not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate in the grantee, but may accompany or follow it, and may as well be done after as before the vesting of the estate, the condition is subsequent." Re Stickney, 85 Md. 102, 35 L. R. A. 696, 36 Atl. 656. Indeed, "in doubtful cases, the disposition of the courts is to construe language as creating a trust or covenant, rather than a condition." Kilpatrick's Case, 81 Md. 193, 27 L. R. A. 645, 31 Atl. 806; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 502. Then the presumption is that the testatrix used the words of gift we have referred to in their usual sense, unless the contrary clearly appears, which is not the case.

Having determined that this was a condition subsequent, the estate was not divested by the death of James, who was engaged in fulfilling the condition when stricken down. The performance becoming impossible by the act of God, it is dispensed with, and the estate vested absolutely. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 506; Hammond v. Hammond, 55 Md. 575. In that case the testator left the use of $2,500 to his brother, "for that he, the said C. L. H., shall look after and take care of our beloved brother R. while he shall live, and bury him at his death." Rezin died before the testator, and it was held that the condition annexed to the bequest was a condition subsequent, and, its performance being made impossible by the act of God, the legatee took unconditionally. In Merrill v. Emery, 10 Pick. 511, the testator left a legacy to his widow, upon condition that she should educate and bring up his granddaughter until she arrived at the age of eighteen years or married. The widow died shortly after the testator, and it was held to be a condition subsequent, and that the nonperformance was excused by the death of the widow. In Burnham v. Burnham, 79 Wis. 557, 48 N. W. 661, the testator had by his will made certain bequests to each of his children, including Daniel, who was an inebriate and spendthrift, and afterwards added a codicil by which he declared that his son Daniel should not have any part or interest in his estate unless, within five years after the testator's decease, he reformed, and became a sober and respectable citizen, of good moral character. He directed that, "in the event that he shall at that time have become a sober man and have a good moral character," in the opinion of the executors, "I give, devise, and bequeath to him, and order paid over to him, one half of the property and estate bequeathed to him in my will," and that, if he continued to remain sober, etc., for the further period of five years, the other half should be paid him. He also directed his executors to hold and retain this share of his estate in trust until the expiration of five years after his death, and thereafter, unless his son had reformed, to pay to the children of Daniel certain sums per annum, and, if he did not reform within 48 L. R. A.

ten years, then to pay the fund to Daniel's children. In less than a year after the testator's death Daniel died. It was held that the estate vested in Daniel, subject to the conditions subsequent, and was not divested by his death, but became absolute, and descended to his widow and children, as provided by the statute in cases of intestate estates. Many other cases might be cited illustrating the tendency of the courts to hold conditions to be subsequent, rather than precedent, and to declare estates to be vested, but it is unnecessary. The article in 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, on Conditions, cites many of them. We are then of the opinion that this estate, having vested in James Pike Ellcott, subject to the condition subsequent, the nonperformance of which is excused by his death, descended to his heirs at law and next of kin, and the decree will be affirmed. But as it was proper, for the protection of the trustee and to settle the rights of the parties, to have the will construed, we will direct that the costs be paid out of the estate.

Decree affirmed, costs to be paid out of the estate.

ECONOMY SAVINGS BANK, Appt.,

v.

Douglas H. GORDON et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. A savings bank is not charged with notice of infirmity in a mortgage an assignment of which it takes as security for a loan, by the fact that its treasurer is cashier of the bank at which the mortgagee, mortgagor, and a corporation of which they are members, and to raise money for which the mortgage is executed, keep their accounts, so that he might have learned the disposition made of the money borrowed.
2. A bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of a mortgage given without any consideration, and which is not accompanied by any negotiable obligation, holds it as a valid encumbrance as against creditors of the mortgagor, since his equities are at least equal to theirs, and in such case the legal title prevails.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to set aside a mortgage covering property belonging to Cecil R. Atkinson as having been executed in fraud of his creditors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel L. Brinton and John P. Poe, for appellant:

A bona fide holder for value without notice is preferred to creditors.

NOTE.—As to rights of a bona fide purchaser of a mortgage, see also Patterson v. Rabb (8 S. C.) 19 L. R. A. 881, and Holmes v. Gardner (Ohio) 20 L. R. A. 329.

By bona fide purchasers we mean persons who have either paid or advanced money upon the faith of the grantor's actual title to the property transferred, or who have accepted specific property in payment of a specific debt.

The policy of the law which favors the security of titles as conducive to the public good would be subverted if a creditor having no lien upon the property should yet be permitted to avail himself of the priority of his debt to defeat such a bona fide purchaser.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. p. 387.

It is not enough that an overprudent and cautious person, if his attention had been called to the circumstance in question, would have been likely to seek an explanation of it.

A bona fide purchaser for value without notice is protected, and he cannot be adjudged to have notice of anything apparently improbable and which diligent and reasonable inquiry would not disclose.

Where a conveyance has been made with the intent to defraud creditors of the grantor, so that it would be voidable as against the grantee, but this grantee has in turn conveyed to a bona fide purchaser for value, the remedial rights of the creditors to have the original and fraudulent transfer set aside are then cut off, and the purchaser has a complete defense against their claim.

A bona fide purchaser for value without notice of a secret equitable lien or an unrecorded equitable title is considered as having an equal claim to the consideration of a court of equity, with the holder of the equitable lien or title. His legal title will therefore prevail.

The creditors of the person against whom the chose in action exists have no concern with any intent of such person to defraud them, though the holder of the chose be equally guilty, after the chose has been assigned for valuable consideration without notice of the fraud.

It does not avail to show that the debtor's assignment was fraudulent, unless it be shown that the assignee participated in the fraudulent intent, or took it under such circumstances that he is chargeable with notice of the fraudulent intent on the part of the assignor.

The burden of proof that the assignee took the mortgage with notice, or that he is not a bona fide purchaser, is on the party who sets up the fraud.

Messrs. Taylor & Keech and Foster & Foster, for appellees:

Having proved the mortgage fraudulent, it is void with respect to the rights of Atkinson's creditors, in whosoever hands it may be found, and no assignee of it can obtain a better title than Steers, the original mortgagee, had.

Inasmuch as Atkinson had creditors at the time the mortgage was given, the only effect of such a voluntary or covinous conveyance could be to hinder them in obtaining the satisfaction of their debts. Consequently, at their suit the mortgage must be held to be void with respect to their rights under the statute of fraudulent and voluntary conveyances.

13 Eliz. chap. 5, Alexander's British Statute, p. 378.

A mortgage has no existence apart from the debt which it is given to secure. It is a mere accessory or incident to the debt; and so far is it inseparably united to the debt (the one being in truth appurtenant to the other) that a separate alienation of either cannot be made, and an assignment of the debt carries in equity the mortgage; and in such a case the mortgagee is held to be a trustee for the assignee of the debt.

This pretended debt, even at best, can only be treated as a mere non-negotiable chose in action; and the assignee of it can in no way obtain any superior title to that of his assignor, and can only take subject to all the equities and defenses to which it is, or might be, subject in the hands of the original pretended creditor.

When a mortgage "stands alone," without an instrument evidencing the debt, or is given to secure a non-negotiable instrument, such as a single bill, or where it is given to secure a note which is indorsed over after maturity, then it passes to an assignee like any other chose in action which is not protected by the law merchant, and the assignee takes only such title as his assignor had.

On petition for rehearing.

Unless all the knowledge gained by Schott as a man, during the course of the transaction, was utterly and completely blotted out of his mind on every occasion when he acted as treasurer of the Economy Savings Bank in this matter, then the Economy Bank knew, in the only way it could know,—i. e., through one of its corporate officers,—everything that this court and the lower court knew when they held that there was no consideration for the mortgage from Cecil R. Atkinson to A. J. Steers, and that it was a mere scheme for raising money to stave off the pending insolvency of the concerns in which the Atkinson brothers were interested.

Schmucker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 30, 1897, Cecil R. Atkinson executed a mortgage upon a warehouse owned by him, on South Howard street, in Baltimore city, to Alonzo J. Steers, which recited that he was indebted to Steers "in the full sum of fifteen thousand dollars, payable February 10th, 1898," and that it was executed to secure the payment of this debt, with interest thereon. The mortgage was in due form, was regularly acknowledged, and had attached to it a proper affidavit as to the bona fides of the consideration therein stated, and it was recorded on the day after its date. No note accompanied the mortgage, but it contained a covenant to pay the mortgage debt and interest. About the same time Steers, the mortgagee, applied to the American National Bank to lend him $6,000 offering to assign the mortgage as security for the loan. Schott, the cashier of the bank, explained to him that a national bank could not lend money upon real-estate security, but informed him that the appellant savings bank, of which he (Schott) was treasurer, had some money on hand, and would lend him $5,000 upon the mortgage, if the security proved to be ample, but the matter must first be referred by the appellant to a committee, who would investigate and report upon the security. Steers assented to the terms suggested by Schott, and a committee from the appellant went upon the mortgaged premises and examined them, and reported favorably upon the loan, provided there were no encumbrances upon the property prior to the mortgage. The matter was then referred by the appellant to its attorney to examine the title, Steers placing the mortgage in its hands for that purpose. The attorney examined the title, and reported favorably upon it, whereupon the appellant, on August 6, 1897, lent the $5,000 to Steers, and at the same time took from him an assignment of the mortgage as security for the loan. The $5,000 so loaned was given to Steers in the check of the appellant to his order upon the American National Bank, in which the appellant had on deposit at that time more than the amount of the check. Steers indorsed the check to the Eastern Electric Company, which at once deposited it to its own credit in the bank upon which it was drawn, and the $5,000 was passed to the credit of the electric company, and charged to the appellant upon the books of the bank. The money was then used by the electric company, to the extent of $2,000, in the payment of a loan which had been made by one Myerdliek upon a previous unrecorded assignment of the Atkinson mortgage, and the remaining $3,000 was almost entirely paid to the American National Bank in satisfaction of obligations due to it by the Eastern Electric Company or by George H. Atkinson, a brother of Cecil R. Atkinson, the mortgagor. Steers subsequently assigned his equity in the $15,000 mortgage to one C. S. Hinchman as collateral security for a loan of $2,000. It appears from the record that Cecil R. Atkinson, the mortgagor, and his four brothers, William J., George H., Harry, and Richard F., were promoters by profession, and together operated and controlled the Eastern Electric Company and other kindred corporations, all of which proved to be speculative enterprises, and soon became insolvent and passed into the hands of receivers. Steers, who was put upon the stand by the appellees, testified that the consideration for the $15,000 mortgage from Atkinson to him consisted of $10,000 of Best Telephone Company bonds and $5,000 of Best Telephone Company stock, which he had let Atkinson have prior to the execution of the mortgage; but his testimony was so inconsistent and contradictory in its different portions that it cannot be accepted as reliable. The whole testimony touching the consideration for the mortgage leads to the conclusion that there was no substantial consideration for it, but that it was executed to provide a means of raising money to assist the Atkinson brothers in staving off the impending insolvency of the Eastern Electric and Best Telephone Companies, and the other enterprises which they were then attempting to keep afloat. On December 29, 1897, nearly five months after the loan of the $5,000 to Steers by the appellant, and the assignment to the latter of the mortgage, Douglas H. Gordon, one of the appellees, obtained a judgment for $5,442.30 against the mortgagor, Cecil R. Atkinson, and his brother William J. Atkinson, on a note given by them to him on November 13, 1896, for a loan which he then made to them upon Best Telephone Company bonds and stock as collateral. Gordon testified that at the time he made this loan William J. Atkinson stated that his brother Cecil R. owned the Howard street warehouse, and he (Gordon) suggested that he be given a mortgage on the warehouse as security for the loan about to be made by him. W. J. Atkinson declined to procure the mortgage, saying that it would injure his brother's credit, but stated that Gordon would have the benefit of the property by having its owner, Cecil R. Atkinson, upon the note. Gordon testified that he relied on this statement of William J. Atkinson in making the loan. Harry W. Boureau, the other appellee, obtained a judgment for $503.80 against William J. Atkinson and Cecil R. Atkinson on September 29, 1897. On December 18, 1897, after Boureau had obtained his judgment, and after Gordon had sued the Atkinsons, but before he had gotten his judgment, the appellees instituted the present case, which is a creditors' suit in equity against the appellant, Cecil R. Atkinson, Steers, and Hinchman. The bill of complaint alleged that the mortgage from Atkinson to Steers, and the successive assignments of it by him to the appellant and Hinchman, were all without consideration, and fraudulent, and prayed to have them declared void. The appellant answered the bill, denying its material allegations, and setting up its title to the mortgage to the extent of the $5,000 loaned on it, and interest, as a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of any infirmity in it. Neither Hinchman nor Steers answered, and a decree pro confesso was entered against them. The case against the appellant came regularly to a hearing, and the court below at first filed an opinion sustaining the appellant's claim; but upon a rehearing of the case the learned judge changed his views of the case, and filed another opinion, of a contrary tenor, and signed the decree appealed from, denying the appellant's claim to a lien on the property, and directed it to be sold for the benefit of the creditors of the mortgagor. In his second opinion the learned judge held, upon the authority of the Cumberland Coal & I. Co. Case, 42 Md. 598, that the appellant, although he found it to be a bona fide purchaser for value of the mortgage, without notice, was not entitled to a lien for its loan to Steers, and interest, made upon the faith of the mortgage, because the latter, not being accompanied by a negotiable obligation, was a mere chose in action, which the appellant must be treated as having taken subject to all equities that might have been urged against it in the hands of Steers, the mortgagee.

Under the facts of the case, the appellant must be regarded as a bona fide purchaser for value of the mortgage, without notice. It advanced its $5,000 upon the mortgage in the ordinary course of business, after a careful inquiry into the value of the property, and an investigation of the title upon the public records. It was not concerned in the disposition made by Steers of the borrowed money, not one dollar of which went back into its hands, or was expended for its benefit. It was not put upon inquiry as to the bona fides of the mortgage by the fact that Schott, its treasurer, was also cashier of the American National Bank, where Steers and the Eastern Electric Company and one or more of the Atkinson brothers kept their accounts, and that he might have seen by an examination of the books of the bank what disposition was made of the borrowed money. There was in fact nothing in the use made of the money to suggest any infirmity in the mortgage.

The next question to be determined is, What are the rights of the appellant, as such bona fide purchaser, against the claims of the appellees? As there was no attempt by Steers to assign the mortgage debt to one person, and the mortgage to another, we are not called upon to consider the relative equities of one who claims as assignee of the debt and another who claims as assignee of the mortgage, as the court were in the cases of Clark v. Levering, 1 Md. Ch. 178, and Byles v. Tome, 39 Md. 461, which were in part relied on by the appellees. What we have to consider is the attitude of the appellant, as the bona fide purchaser of both debt and mortgage, towards the creditors of the mortgagor, who were such at the time the mortgage was made. The mortgage was not given to secure an actual indebtedness of $15,000, as it professes on its face to have been. Its execution was evidently a means adopted by the parties to it to clothe Steers, the mortgagee, with the appearance of a good title to a large debt secured by a valid mortgage, in order to enable him to raise money upon it. It was not fraudulent, in the sense that its execution had been procured by fraud, misrepresentation, or constraint practised on the owner of the land who executed it, as was the case in Central Bank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 305, 81 Am. Dec. 597, and Cumberland Coal & I. Co. v. Parish, 42 Md. 598, in each of which the defrauded mortgagor was protected in equity against the assignee of the fraudulent mortgage. In the present case the execution of the mortgage was the voluntary and deliberate act of the mortgagor, from which he had no equity to be relieved, even as against the mortgagee. Snyder v. Snyder, 51 Md. 77; Cushwa v. Cushwa, 5 Md. 44. We have therefore no question before us of subjecting the rights of the appellant, as assignee of the mortgage, to any equities to which the assignor would have been liable in favor of the mortgagor; for here it is plain that there were no such equities. The present mortgage is to be regarded as fraudulent only in the sense that, having been made to secure a simulated, and not a real, indebtedness, it operated to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the mortgagor, and was therefore obnoxious to the provisions of the statute of 13 Eliz. chap. 5. The real question in the case is thus narrowed down to a comparison of the relative strength of the claims on the mortgaged property of the appellant, as assignee of the specific lien of the mortgage, and the appellees, as subsisting general creditors of the mortgagor, having reduced their debts to judgments after the assignment of the mortgage had been made. If the conveyance under consideration had been a fraudulent deed, instead of a mortgage, the right of the appellant, as a bona fide purchaser, to a lien on the property for the $5,000 advanced, and interest, could not seriously be questioned. Cone v. Cross, 72 Md. 102, 19 Atl. 391; Hull v. Deering, 80 Md. 432, 31 Atl. 416; Hinkle v. Wilson, 53 Md. 293; Worthington v. Bullett, 6 Md. 198. The broader and more general proposition that a bona fide purchaser, without notice, under a deed from a fraudulent grantee, takes a good title, which is not impaired by the fact that judgments were obtained against the fraudulent grantor prior to the conveyance by the fraudulent grantee, is well sustained by authority. 4 Kent, Com. 464; Slicer v. Chapman, 121 Mass. 404; Phelps v. Morrison, 24 N. J. Eq. 195; Totten v. Brady, 54 Md. 170; Swan v. Dent, 2 Md. Ch. 111 (note 9, Brantly's ed.); Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 369. In the case of Farmers' Bank v. Brooke, 40 Md. 257, the title of a bona fide purchaser of a mortgage note to the lien of the mortgage securing it was upheld against the suit of the creditors of the mortgagor, although it was admitted that the note and mortgage had been given in prejudice of the rights of his creditors, and would have been void as against them in the hands of the mortgagee. The fact that the mortgage in that case was accompanied by a promissory note distinguishes it from the case at bar, but the circumstance of the negotiability of the mortgage debt was not expressly mentioned or dwelt upon in the court's opinion. See also Danbury v. Robinson, 14 N. J. Eq. 218, 219, 82 Am. Dec. 244.

A bona fide mortgagee from a fraudulent grantee has in a number of cases been held to be entitled to protection, to the extent of the debt due him, against the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, upon the ground that a mortgagee is to be treated as a purchaser, to the extent of his interest, within the meaning of the term "purchaser" as used in statutes such as that of 13 Eliz. chap. 5; and this where the mortgage was not accompanied by a negotiable instrument. Ledyard v. Butler, 9 Paige, 136, 137, 37 Am. Dec. 379; Murphy v. Briggs, 89 N. Y. 451; Shorten v. Drake, 38 Ohio St. 76; Moore v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 55 N. Y. 41, 14 Am. Rep. 173. 48 L. R. A.

If the mortgage in the present case had been made directly from Cecil R. Atkinson to the appellant, no question could be made by Atkinson's creditors as to the appellant's lien upon the mortgaged property to the extent of the money advanced bona fide upon the faith of the property at the time the mortgage was made. When, therefore, Atkinson clothed Steers with the appearance of a good mortgage title of record to the property, for the purpose of enabling him to raise money upon the mortgage, and the appellant, relying upon this appearance of good title in Steers, after a careful examination of the public records and a failure to find any prior encumbrances upon the property, parted with its money in good faith, it is entitled to the favor of a court of equity in the consideration of the relative equities of the parties to the controversy. This court, in Seldner v. McCreery, 75 Md. 296, 23 Atl. 643, said: "Where a title is perfect on its face, and no known circumstances exist to impeach it or put a purchaser on inquiry, one who buys bona fide and for value occupies one of the most highly favored positions in the law." The appellant did not trust to the personal responsibility of the mortgagor, but lent its money upon the faith of the particular property covered by the mortgage, and required an assignment of the mortgage at the time of so doing. On the contrary, the appellees trusted to the mortgagor, or to such other collaterals as he lodged with them; and the appellee Gordon, although he knew when he lent his money that Cecil R. Atkinson owned the Howard street warehouse, did not insist upon having a lien on it for his loan, but deliberately relied, so far as the warehouse was concerned, upon his right as an ordinary creditor of its owner. The equities of the appellant are at least equal to those of the appellees, and, having the legal title to the warehouse, it has the stronger claim thereon under the familiar principle that where equities are equal the legal title must prevail. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 417; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 370; Townsend v. Little, 109 U. S. 512, 27 L. ed. 1015, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Black v. Cord, 2 Harr. & G. 103; Basset v. Nowworthy, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 4th Am. ed. 1. In Dyson v. Simmons, 48 Md. 214, it was held, upon the authority of many cases there cited, that if a party makes, or affects to make, a mortgage which proves to be defective by reason of some informality or omission, even on the part of the mortgagee himself, the conscience of the mortgagor is bound, and equity will recognize and enforce the lien of the defective mortgage, and give it precedence over the subsisting creditors of the mortgagor, and also over judgments obtained against him after the date of the mortgage. General creditors have no lien on the property of the debtor, and a judgment is only a general lien, and is for that reason subordinate to the prior specific equitable lien of such a defective mortgage. The case at bar does not come directly within the principle asserted in the last-mentioned case, but it is certainly one in which, by reason of its peculiar facts, the conscience of the mortgagor was especially bound to the appellant; and we think the same course of reasoning might well be applied, within proper limits, to the appellant's protection.

This court has frequently been called upon to assert and define the rights of the creditors of a grantor, as against a conveyance made by him which, by reason of inadequacy or want of consideration, or even by design, operated to hinder, delay, or defraud them. The court has not hesitated to strike down such conveyances at the suit of the creditor, holding that one cannot make a voluntary conveyance of his property, as against the rights of subsisting creditors, nor can he, as against such creditors, sell it for a consideration that bears no adequate relation to its real value. When, however, in such cases, the rights of parties, even if they were the immediate grantees under the conveyance, who had in good faith parted with value in reliance upon the conveyance, have had to be measured against those of the creditors, it has uniformly been held that, in order to do full justice to all the parties in such cases, a court of equity, in setting aside the deed, will allow it to stand as security for the consideration actually paid, and apply the balance to the payment of the vendor's debts. These propositions were distinctly upheld in the cases already cited of Cone v. Cross, Hull v. Deering, Hinkle v. Wilson, and Worthington v. Bullitt. We regard the principle of the last-mentioned cases, in none of which was the position of the party claiming under the conveyance strengthened by any element of negotiability in the subject-matter of the thing assigned to him, as properly applicable to the one at bar. The mortgaged property should be sold, and the proceeds of the sale, after deducting proper expenses, applied first to the payment of the $5,000 lent by the appellant to Steers, with interest thereon, and then to the payment of the creditors of Cecil R. Atkinson, the mortgagor, who have come or may come into the case, according to their legal priorities.

We do not mean by this decision to disturb the authority of the Cumberland Coal & I. Co. Case, upon which the learned judge below mainly relied in changing his opinion, nor that of the Copeland Case. In each of these cases the issue on trial was between the owner of property who had been fraudulently induced to execute a mortgage upon it, and an assignee of the fraudulent mortgage, and they were both cases of flagrant fraud in fact. The rights of the creditors of the grantor were not in issue in either case. In the Cumberland Coal & I. Co. Case the court asserted the proposition that the transfer of a mortgage is so far within the rule which applies to choses in action, that when the assignment is made without the concurrence of the mortgagor, as in that case, the assignee takes subject to the same equities and defenses to which the assignor was liable. We do not, however, understand the court, by what was said in that opinion, to intimate that, when the equities in behalf of the creditors of the mortgagor in such a case came to be asserted, their claims would be enforced without regard to the proposition, so frequently upheld by this court in setting aside fraudulent conveyances at the suit of the creditor of the grantor, that, in order to do justice to all parties in such cases, the conveyances would be allowed to stand as security for the consideration actually paid on the faith of it by the party holding the legal title under it.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Rehearing denied.

St. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY.

(96 Fed. Rep. 298, 37 C. C. A. 499.)

1. The provision of a penalty for violation of a statute enjoining upon railroad companies the duty of blocking switches does not make that remedy exclusive of actions by persons injured by the neglect to do so, unless that intention is to be inferred from the whole purview of the statute.

NOTE.—Liability of an employer for injuries received by servants owing to the want of blocking at switches.

- I. Want of blocking not negligence per se apart from statute.
- II. Statutes requiring frogs, etc., to be blocked.
- III. Want of blocking considered as a risk assumed by the servant.
- I. Want of blocking not negligence per se apart from statute.

In common-law actions the liability of railroad L. R. A.

2. Continuance, without complaint, in service of a railroad company with knowledge that it has not complied with a statute requiring under penalty the blocking of switches, does not constitute an assumption of risk of injury therefrom.
3. Assumption of risk is a term of the contract of employment, expressed or implied from the circumstances of the employment, by which the servant agrees that dangers of injury obviously incident to the discharge of his duty shall be at his risk.
4. The courts will not enforce or recognize an agreement, express or implied, on the part of a servant to waive the per-way companies for failing to provide blocking in frogs and similar places on their tracks, where there is danger that the feet of employees may be caught while they are engaged in the performance of their duties, has always been treated as primarily an open question of fact, the difference of opinion disclosed by the decisions of courts of review having reference, in the first place, to the question whether a want of blocking is a circumstance which of itself justifies the inference of negligence, and, in the next place, to the proper weight to be formance of a statutory duty imposed on the master for the protection of the servant, and in the interest of the public, and enforceable by criminal prosecution.

5. An employee's contributory negligence is a defense to an action founded on a violation of the statutory duty of a railroad company to block guard rails and frogs.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, Western Division, to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

attributed to the evidence relied upon to support or rebut this inference.

A finding that the absence of blocking imported negligence was upheld in Sherman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 34 Minn. 259, 25 N. W. 593.

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Baxter (1894) 42 Neb. 793, 60 N. W. 1044, the court did not doubt that the failure of the company to block its frogs was evidence of negligence, but held that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, since there was no allegation that the servant did not know, and was excusably ignorant, of their condition.

Compare also Rush v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 36 Kan. 129, 12 Pac. 582. A case which tends to support the same view is Union P. R. Co. v. James (1896) 163 U. S. 485, 41 L. ed. 236, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1109, but the actual rulings were on other points (see below); and the case of Southern P. Co. v. Seley, referred to below, seems to commit the supreme court to the theory that evidence merely of the want of blocking is not enough to establish culpability.

By most courts, however, it has been considered that the servant, in order to make good his right to recover damages for injuries from this cause, must do more than merely establish the want of blocking. That is to say, he has the burden of proving that frogs, etc., without blocking are not reasonably safe for the purpose for which they are designed (Spencer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1893) 67 Hun, 196, 22 N. Y. Supp. 100; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lonergan (1886) 118 Ill. 41, 7 N. E. 55), and must show that, upon the whole, the use of the block would be prudent, and guard against dangers in one direction without the introduction of perils in another. McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co. (1882) 49 Mich. 466, 13 N. W. 819.

Evidence which is merely to the effect that, where blocks are used, it may be safer for the employees than where they are not used, will not justify the inference of negligence. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lonergan (1886) 118 Ill. 41, 7 N. E. 55; Huhn v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 92 Mo. 440, 4 S. W. 937.

A court will not pronounce a railway company negligent, where no proof is given that blocked frogs are a device in general use on other roads. Spencer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1893) 67 Hun, 196, 22 N. Y. Supp. 100.

Where the evidence is that the usage of railway companies in regard to blocking frogs is conflicting, some adopting and some rejecting that precaution. McNeill v. New York, L. E. & 48 L. R. A.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

This writ is brought to review a judgment for the defendant in a suit to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while in defendant's employ as a yard switchman in its railroad yards at Cincinnati, Ohio. While plaintiff was attempting to couple two freight cars, his foot was caught in an unblocked guard rail, and in his effort to extricate the foot his right hand was crushed between the drawheads of the cars, and injured so badly as to require amputation. Plaintiff had been in defendant's employ seven months. About one third of that time he was engaged during the daytime, and two thirds during the night. He had had nine years' experience as a railroad man. A railroad man of experience can see at a glance whether a guard rail or switch is blocked or not. There were a great many

W. R. Co. (1893) 71 Hun, 24, 24 N. Y. Supp. 610.

Nor where the utmost that is established by the plaintiff's evidence is that the device of blocking is still an experiment, and of doubtful practicability. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Smith (1885) 18 Ill. App. 119; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lonergan (1886) 118 Ill. 41, 7 N. E. 55.

In the latter case the court said: "It must appear, before the defendant can be held liable, that the switch or turn-out, as constructed and used, was not reasonably safe, or that it was not constructed with the usual care and skill. An employer is not required to change his machinery in order to apply or adopt every new invention. . . . The fact that a few of the railroads of the country have adopted this new device, or that the defendant has used it on a part of its road, is not enough to establish its utility, and establish negligence in every other road that adheres to the old system. The old system of constructing switches must be condemned." It was accordingly held error to instruct the jury that the law requires a railroad company to use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in providing and maintaining reasonably safe structures, tracks, sidetracks, switches, turn-outs, etc., and if it fails to do so, and an injury happens in consequence thereof to an employee in the exercise of due and reasonable care, then the railroad company would be liable. The specific negligence charged in the declaration being the omission to use blocking, such an instruction would be understood by the jury as laying down the rule that the company was absolutely required to use blocks. (Mulkey, Ch. J., and Shope and Magruder, JJ., dissent.)

"An employer is not bound to make use of the newest mechanical appliances for the purpose of insuring the safety of his employees, especially if it does not appear that, on the whole, it would be advantageous to them. So, a railway company is not bound to block its frogs, particularly if it does not appear that, in doing so, it would not entail greater dangers than it would avert." McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co. (1882) 49 Mich. 466, 13 N. W. 819.

In Southern P. Co. v. Seley (1894) 152 U. S. 145, 38 L. ed. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530, it was held error to refuse the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that, if they find from the evidence that the railroad companies used both the blocked and the unblocked frog, and that it is questionable which is the safest or most suitable for the business of the roads, then the use of the unblocked frog is not negligence, and the jury are instructed not to im-guard rails and switches in the yards where plaintiff worked. With the exception of a few, where experimental blocks were used, the defendant did not use blocks in either its guard rails or switches. Plaintiff said he did not know that the guard rail in which his foot was caught was not blocked, and that he had not noticed whether the guard rails and switches of defendant generally were blocked or not. The plaintiff relied on the following statute of Ohio, passed March 23, 1888 (85 Ohio Laws, p. 105): "Every railroad corporation operating a railroad or part of a railroad in this state shall, before the first day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, adjust, fill, or block the frogs, switches, and guard rails on its tracks, with the exception of guard rails on bridges, so as to prevent the feet of its employees from being caught therein. The work shall be done to the satisfaction of the railroad commissioner. Any railroad corporation failing to comply with the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars." It appeared from the evidence that the defendant company was operating this railroad at the time of the passage of the act, and has operated it ever since. At the close of the evidence the trial court directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant on the ground that defendant's failure to block its rails and switches was obvious, and the plaintiff must be held, notwithstanding the statute, to have assumed the risk of injury therefrom, and upon such verdict entered judgment for the defendant.

Messrs. Edgar W. Cist and Harlan Cleveland, with Mr. Charles M. Cist, for plaintiff in error:

pute the same as negligence to the defendant, and they should find for the defendant." In the lower court ((1890) 6 Utah, 819, 23 Pac. 751) it had been held negligence not to have blocking.

A special finding that the frogs of the defendant company were the same as those used by the principal roads in the country was one of those upon which the plaintiff's right to recover was denied in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. McCormick (1881) 74 Ind. 440. To the same effect, see Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Risdon (1891) 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. 786, declaring that to maintain unblocked frogs of a standard pattern is not negligence (dissenting, Lewis, J., whose opinion is noticed below), and Smith v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. (1878) 69 Mo. 32, 33 Am. Rep. 484, holding a railroad company not liable for injuries caused by a guard rail of a pattern in general use, through a safe one might have been constructed.

By other courts very much less weight is ascribed to the fact that the defendant company had complied with the usage of other roads.

In Huhn v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 92 Mo. 440, 4 S. W. 937, it was held that the question whether the company was negligent in maintaining a guard rail without blocking could not be resolved merely by showing how many roads used blocks. Such a fact was merely one for the consideration of the jury.

It was also held in Austin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 93 Iowa, 236, 61 N. W. 849, that an instruction was correct which declared that a brakeman who was injured through catching his foot in a space left unfilled between the ties on each side of the bars of a switch was not precluded from recovering by proof that this arrangement was customary.

The following vigorous argument by Lewis, J., in his dissenting opinion in Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Risdon (1891) 87 Va. 335, 12 S. E. 786, is worth quoting: "That the 'frogs' were dangerous is not disputed. But it is contended that they were of the standard pattern, and that that fact of itself repels the imputation of negligence. From this view I dissent. If a standard frog, unguarded and situated as this one was, in a place where there are many tracks and where cars are shifted at all hours of the day and night, is not reasonably safe, then the company, in allowing it to remain unguarded, was guilty of negligence, and the jury rightly so found. Nor upon this point are we left to inference. The expert evidence for the plaintiff is conclusive that the dangerous condition of the frogs could easily have been guarded against by the device of 'filling' them with cinders, which simple and inexpensive method renders them safe to those whose duties call them upon the track, and at the same time does not interfere with their ordinary use. The witness Perry, who for a number of years was in the employ of the defendant company as roadmaster, testifies that at terminal points, or in yards where much shifting is done, the frogs ought always to be filled, as a protection to switchmen, and this is so well understood, he says, that the laws of some states expressly require it to be done. And why should they not be filled? Why should the servant be exposed to unnecessary risks that can so easily be guarded against? Is the rule that the master must exercise reasonable or

Where a railway company has been in the habit of blocking its guard rails at some particular place, there is a special ground for charging it with negligence in failing to replace them when forced out by accident; but it has been held that, even conceding there is a duty to see that there is a blocking under such circumstances, it is plain that, upon general principles, the servant cannot recover for an injury caused by the want of the blocking, in the absence of evidence showing that it had been displaced so long that the company might, by the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered its absence. Haakins v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1894) 79 Hun, 159, 29 N. Y. Supp. 274. See note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (1898; Mich.) 41 L. R. A. 38.

The failure of a railroad company to block a guard rail in its yard is not ground for recovery by a switchman thrown from a car, whose arm was caught and crushed between the guard rail and the main rail; blocking being intended only to prevent feet from being caught. Rutledge v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1892) 110 Mo. 312, 19 S. W. 38.

An examination of the principles on which the doctrine of "assumption of risk" rests will show that it has no application in the case of the violation of a statute.

The principle underlying this doctrine will be found to be that no negligence is properly attributable to the master where the servant, having knowledge of the dangerous business or defective appliances, agrees to continue to work.

railroad men, testify that switches were blocked before and after the accident in certain railroad yards where they worked. Nor is it a valid objection to their testimony that they acquired their experience from work at ordinary railroad yards, and not at switch tracks about coal shafts. Hamilton v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. (1891) 108 Mo. 364, 18 S. W. 977.

Where both parties in an action for indemnity for an injury caused by an unblocked frog go to trial on the single question whether it was or was not blocked at the time of trial, the defendant cannot take for the first time on appeal the point that the case should have been tried upon the theory that the defendant, if it had once blocked the frog, incurred no liability by reason of its subsequent displacement, unless it had actual or constructive notice of such displacement. Union P. R. Co. v. James (1896) 163 U. S. 485, 41 L. ed. 236, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1109.

In the absence of any testimony as to the condition of a frog prior to an accident, the jury are at liberty to infer that it had never been blocked. Ibid.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Bell (1890) 75 Tex. 50, 12 S. W. 321, the court reversed a judgment for a brakeman based on a finding that the company was negligent as regards the manner in which the guard rail was laid with respect to the track rail, but the reversal was merely on the ground that the instructions had imposed too high a degree of diligence on the company, and it is not apparent from the report what precise precautions it was contended that the company should have adopted.

II. Statutes requiring frogs; etc., to be blocked.

In many jurisdictions the obligations of railway companies in regard to blocking have been definitely fixed by statute, the failure to comply with such a statute being, of course, negligence per se. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Van Horne (1895) 37 U. S. App. 262, 69 Fed. Rep. 139, 16 C. C. A. 182; Craig v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. (1896) 85 Ohio L. J. 15.

That the duty they impose is also personal and nonassignable in such a sense that a railway company cannot relieve itself from responsibility by delegating its performance to an employee, see Le May v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1890) 17 Ont. App. Rep. 293.

The statutes requiring blocking to be used are as follows:

If plaintiff were chargeable with constructive knowledge that the frogs or guard rails generally were not blocked, then he must be equally chargeable with knowledge of the fact that the company was experimenting with blocks preparatory to introducing them generally.

Such conduct of the company amounted filled by the adoption of a method of blocking which the ordinary use of the road renders ineffectual in two or three days,—in this case by the wheel flange wearing down the blocking so far that it became practically useless. The alternative safe method suggested was to give the blocking a grooved or furrowed surface so as to allow the flanges of the wheels to pass without interference. *Eastman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. tion for injuries act, 55 Vict. chap. 30 (Ont. Rev. Stat. 1897, chap. 160, § 5, subsec. 3), railway companies are required to block frogs. See also a similar provision in the earlier act of 49 Vict. chap. 28 (Ont. Rev. Stat. 1887, chap. 141, § 4, subsec. 3).

III. Want of blocking considered as a risk assumed by the servant.

In many cases the question whether a want of blocking imports negligence on the master's part may become of no practical importance in view of the fact that the servant brings himself within the operation of the familiar rule that he cannot recover for injuries caused by his continuing to expose himself to dangers of which he had actual or constructive notice. The plaintiff's action was deemed to be barred on this ground in the following cases: Appel v. Buffalo, N. Y. & P. R. Co. (1888) 111 N. Y. 550, 19 N. E. 93 (switchman after working for several years in a yard is presumed, as matter of law, to understand the risks created by the want of blocking); Southern P. Co. v. Seley (1894) 152 U. S. 145, 38 L. ed. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530 (damages arising from the use of unblocked frogs in a certain yard presumed to be accepted by a conductor of freight trains, whose duty frequently brought him into that yard); Spencer v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1893) 67 Hun, 196, 22 N. Y. Supp. 100 (plaintiff had been working near the frog for an hour and a half in broad daylight, and the frog was in plain sight); Rush v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 36 Kan. 129, 12 Pac. 582 (switchman who has been working for two months in a yard is affected with notice of the want of blocking between a guard and main rail at a certain place).

To same effect, see Ames v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1893) 135 Ind. 363, 35 N. E. 117; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Davis (1892) 55 Ark. 462, 18 S. W. 628 (1891) 54 Ark. 389, 15 S. W. 895; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Mc- to a notification to him that it intended shortly to block the guard rails.

It was an implied promise, and plaintiff should be presumed to have relied upon it as upon any promise to repair a defect.

Messrs. Harmon, Colston, Goldsmith, & Headly, for defendant in error:

Knowing the fact that no rails were blocked, plaintiff's ignorance about this particular rail would have been of no consequence.

His duties brought him constantly over and about these frogs and guard rails, so that a man exercising his sight and employing his ordinary senses could not have avoided discovering and knowing the fact that the guard rail was not blocked, and understanding such danger as resulted from that fact.

Appel v. Buffalo, N. Y. & P. R. Co. 111 N. Y. 553, 19 N. E. 93; Southern P. Co. v. Seley, 152 U. S. 154, 38 L. ed. 395, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530.

Whatever the negligence of one party, it is not the proximate cause of an injury resulting to the other, if the other, after discovering such negligence, might have avoided its consequence by reasonable prudence on his own part.

Assuming that when plaintiff was hurt defendant was presently violating the statute to plaintiff's knowledge, this would not entitle him to recover on the facts shown here.

Injuries from unblocked frogs and rails come within the rule of obvious risk.

Southern P. Co. v. Seley, 152 U. S. 145, 38 L. ed. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. McCormick, 74 Ind. 440; Cormick (1881) 74 Ind. 440; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Smith (1885) 18 Ill. App. 119; McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co. (1882) 49 Mich. 466, 13 N. W. 819.

The danger arising from the want of a block between a rail and a guard rail at a switch is so obvious that even an inexperienced brakeman will, as matter of law, be presumed to understand the risk incident to working without it. Mayes v. Chicago, B. I. & P. R. Co. (1884) 63 Iowa, 562, 14 N. W. 840, 19 N. W. 680, modifying on rehearing the opinion expressed at the first hearing,—that it was for the jury to say whether the inexperience of the brakeman was a sufficient excuse for his nonappreciation of the danger.

A railway servant is not necessarily debarred from recovery for an injury caused by a want of blocking at a frog, for the reason that, although he did not know that the frog in question was not blocked, he knew that some of the frogs were not blocked. Sherman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1885) 84 Minn. 259, 25 N. W. 593 (instruction to opposite effect, rightly refused). The court said: "If the defendant's habit, custom, or mode of doing business at that yard was to protect the frogs by blocks,—if that was the rule of its conduct,—Sherman had a right to assume, where he had not notice to the contrary, that such mode or custom had been followed in respect to any particular frog. He had a right to assume, in the absence of such notice, that the defendant had acted according to the general rule adopted by it for its business, although he may have known some instances in which it had not done so. The omission at that yard to put in the blocks, not as a general rule, but in isolated instances, would not make out a case like that of the Hughes Case, of an unsafe and careless custom or habit of doing business, known, or which by the use of his senses ought to be known, to an employee; in which case the employee, by continuing in the employment without objection on his part, or promise on the part of the master to change it, is held to assume the risk incident to that mode of doing the business. A single instance, or any number of instances, not amounting to a custom or mode of business, of culpable negligence on the part of the master, will not cast on the employee the risk of subsequent or other similar acts of negligence."

In Quebec the risk of a brakeman's catching his foot in an unblocked frog seems to be regarded as an ordinary risk incidental to his employment. Bourgeault v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1887) Mont. L. R. 5 S. C. 249, holding the plaintiff unable to recover upon an allegation that the frog was out of order.

As it is manifest that a split switch cannot be blocked without destroying its efficiency, the risk arising from the absence of blocking in this case is one of those assumed by a man who enters the service of a railroad company which, to his knowledge, uses such switches. Grand v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1890) 83 Mich. 564, 11 L. B. A. 402, 47 N. W. 837.

It should be remembered that, under the Missouri doctrine, a brakeman is not debarred from recovery for injuries received by a want of blocking merely because he knew of such want. It must also be shown that a continuance of his work threatened immediate danger such as no prudent man would encounter. Huhn v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 92 Mo. 440, 4 S. W. 987.

As the servant assumes the risk incident to the use of his master's appliances in the condition in which they have always been since he begun work, in so far as he is affected with notice of such condition, a general verdict for the plaintiff cannot stand where it is specially found that there had been a change in the condition of the frogs and switches on defendant's road, and that the plaintiff might have known of such condition if he had taken pains to inquire about it. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. McCormick (1881) 74 Ind. 440.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In the absence of the statute, and upon common-law principles, we have no doubt that in this case the plaintiff would be held to have assumed the risk of the absence of blocks in the guard rails and switches of the defendant. His denial of knowledge of the fact that the particular guard rail causing the injury was unblocked is entirely immaterial. Nor is his vague statement that he was so busy as not to notice whether the rails and switches of plaintiff generally were unblocked in a yard where there were hundreds of guard rails and switches, and in which he was constantly at work for seven months, of more significance or weight. His evidence upon this point is not creditable to him. He could only have been ignorant of the admitted policy of the defendant in respect to blocks through the grossest failure of duty on his part in a matter that much concerned his personal safety and the proper operation of the road. In such a case the authorities leave no doubt that the servant assumes the risk of the absence of the blocks, and the employer cannot be charged with actionable negligence towards him. Southern P. Co. v. Seley, 152 U. S. 145, 38 L. ed. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530; Appel v. Buffalo, N. Y. & P. R. Co. 111 N. Y. 550, 19 N. E. 93; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Risdon, 87 Va. 335, 339, 12 S. E. 786; Wood v. Locke, 147 Mass. 604, 18 N. E. 578; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. McCormick, 74 Ind. 440; Wabash R. Co. v. Ray, 152 Ind. 392, 51 N. E. 920; Rush v. Missouri P. R. Co. 36 Kan. 129, 12 Pac. 582; Mayes v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 562, 14 N. W. 340, 19 N. W. 680; Wilson v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 37 Minn. 326, 33 N. W. 908; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Baxter, 42 Neb. 793, 60 N. W. 1044; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Davis, 54 Ark. 389, 15 S. W. 895.

The sole question in the case is whether the statute requiring defendant railway, on penalty of a fine, to block its guard rails and frogs, changes the rule of liability of the defendant, and relieves the plaintiff from the effect of the assumption of risk which would otherwise be implied against him. We have already had occasion to consider in a more or less direct way the effect of the statute. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Van Horne, 37 U. S. App. 262, 69 Fed. Rep. 139, 16 C. C. A. 182; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Craig, 37 U. S. App. 654, 73 Fed. Rep. 642, 19 C. C. A. 631. In these cases we held that the failure on the part of a railway company to comply with the statute was negligence per se. A further consideration of the 48 L. R. A.

statute confirms our view. The intention of the legislature of Ohio was to protect the employees of railways from injury from a very frequent source of danger by compelling the railway companies to adopt a well-known safety device. It was passed in pursuance of the police power of the state, and it expressly provided, as one mode of enforcing it, for a criminal prosecution of the delinquent companies. The expression of one mode of enforcing it did not exclude the operation of another, and in many respects more efficacious, means of compelling compliance with its terms, to wit, the right of civil action against a delinquent railway company by one of the class sought to be protected by the statute for injury caused by a failure to comply with its requirements. Unless it is to be inferred from the whole purview of the act that it was the legislative intention that the only remedy for breach of the statutory duty imposed should be the proceeding by fine, it follows that upon proof of a breach of that duty by the railway company, and injury thereby occasioned to the employee, a cause of action is established. Groves v. Wimborne [1898] 2 Q. B. 402, 407; Atkinson v. Newcastle & G. Waterworks Co. L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 441; Gorris v. Scott, L. R. 9 Exch. 125. In this case there can be no doubt that the act was passed to secure protection and a newly defined right to the employee. To confine the remedy to a criminal proceeding in which the fine to be imposed on conviction was not even payable to the injured employee or to one complaining, would make the law not much more than a dead letter. The case of Groves v. Wimborne involved the construction of a statute quite like the one at bar, and a right of action was held to be given thereby to the injured servant in addition to the criminal prosecution. The courts of Ohio have given the statute under discussion the same construction. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lambright, 5 Ohio C. C. 433, affirmed by the supreme court of Ohio without opinion, 29 Ohio L. J. 359.

Do a knowledge on the part of the employee that the company is violating the statute, and his continuance in the service thereafter without complaint, constitute such an assumption of the risk as to prevent recovery? The answer to this question is to be found in a consideration of the principles upon which the doctrine of the assumption of risk rests. If one employs his servant to mend and strengthen a defective staircase in a church steeple, and in the course of the employment part of the staircase gives way, and the servant is injured or killed, it would hardly be claimed that the master was wanting in care towards the servant in not having the staircase which fell in a safe condition. Why not? Because, even if no express communication is had upon the subject, the servant must know, and the master must intend, that the dangers necessarily incident to the employment are to be at the risk of the servant, who may be presumed to receive greater compensation for the work on account of the risk. The foregoing is an extreme case, perhaps, but it fairly illustrates the principle of assumption of risk in the relation of master and servant. Assumption of risk is a term of the contract of employment, express or implied from the circumstances of the employment, by which the servant agrees that dangers of injury obviously incident to the discharge of the servant's duty shall be at the servant's risk. In such cases the acquiescence of the servant in the conduct of the master does not defeat a right of action on the ground that the servant causes or contributes to cause the injury to himself; but the correct statement is that no right of action arises in favor of the servant at all, for, under the terms of the employment, the master violates no legal duty to the servant in failing to protect him from dangers the risk of which he agreed expressly or impliedly to assume. The master is not, therefore, guilty of actionable negligence towards the servant. This is the most reasonable explanation of the doctrine of assumption of risk, and is well supported by the judgments of Lord Justices Bowen and Fry in the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 685, 695. See also language of Lord Watson in Smith v. Baker, [1891] A. C. 325, and O'Maley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. 158 Mass. 135, 32 N. E. 1119. It makes logical that most frequent exception to the application of doctrine by which the employee who notifies his master of a defect in the machinery or place of work, and remains in the service on a promise of repair, has a right of action if injury results from the defect while he is waiting for the repair of the defect, and has reasonable ground to expect it. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612; Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 958, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 978; Snow v. Housatonic R. Co. 8 Allen, 441, 85 Am. Dec. 720; Gardner v. Michigan C. R. Co. 150 U. S. 349, 37 L. ed. 1107, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140. From the notice and the promise is properly implied the agreement by the master that he will assume the risk of injury pending the making of the repair.

If, then, the doctrine of the assumption of risk rests really upon contract, the only question remaining is whether the courts will enforce or recognize as against a servant an agreement, express or implied on his part, to waive the performance of a statutory duty of the master imposed for the protection of the servant, and in the interest of the public, and enforceable by criminal prosecution. We do not think they will. To do so would be to nullify the object of the statute. The only ground for passing such a statute is found in the inequality of terms upon which the railway company and its servants deal in regard to the dangers of their employment. The manifest legislative purpose was to protect the servant by positive law, because he had not previously shown himself capable of protecting himself by contract; and it would entirely defeat this purpose thus to permit the servant "to contract the master out" of the statute. It would certainly be novel for a court to recognize as valid an agreement between two persons that one should violate a criminal statute; and yet, if the assumption of risk is the term of a contract, then the application of it in the case at bar is to do just that. The cases upon the subject are by no means satisfactory, and, strange as it may seem, but few are in point. There is one English case which entirely supports our conclusion, and several dicta by English judges of like tenor. Several American cases on their facts also sustain the principle, though it must be confessed they do not very clearly state the true ground of their conclusion. There is one American case which is directly to the contrary, and possibly one other ought so to be regarded. There are several American cases that are said to be opposed to our view, but an examination of the facts in each will clearly distinguish them from the case at bar.

In the case of Baddeley v. Granville, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 423, the action was for the wrongful death of a miner, due to his employer's violation of a statute, and the defense of assumption of risk was set up. Section 52 of the coal mines regulation act of 1872 required a bankaman to be constantly present while the men were going up or down the shaft, but it was the regular practice of the defendant, as the plaintiff's husband well knew, not to have a bankaman in attendance during the night. The plaintiff's husband was killed, in coming out of the mine at night, by an accident arising through the absence of a bankaman. It was held that the plaintiff's intestate did not, by continued service after he knew of the violation of the statute, thereby assume the risk of danger therefrom. The court says (page 426): "An obligation imposed by statute ought to be capable of enforcement with respect to all future dealings between parties affected by it. As to the result of past breaches of the obligation, people may come to what agreements they like, but as to future breaches of it there ought to be no encouragement given to the making of an agreement between A. and B. that B. shall be at liberty to break the law which has been passed for the protection of A. . . . If the supposed agreement . . . comes to this: that the master employs the servant on the terms that the latter shall waive the breach by the master of an obligation imposed on him by statute, and shall connive at his disregard of the statutory obligation imposed on him for the benefit of others as well as of himself, such an agreement would be in violation of public policy, and ought not to be listened to."

The judges deciding the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 685, 696, 703, had affirmed the view that assumption of risk did not apply to the neglect of a specific statutory duty imposed for the benefit of a class, but it was not the case before them. They said that the case of Clarke v. Holmes, 7 Hurlst. & N. 937, 6 Hurlst. & N. 349, proceeded on this ground, though it is difficult to find the ground stated in the opinions. Durant v. Lexington Coal Min. Co. 97 Mo. 62, 10 S. W. 484; Grand v. Michigan C. R. Co. 83 Mich. 564, 11 L. R. A. 402, 47 N. W. 837; Litchfield Coal Co. v. Taylor, 81 Ill. 590; and Boyd v. Brazil Block Coal Co. (Ind. App.) 50 N. E. 368,—were all cases where assumption of risk would have been a complete defense if applicable in case of a failure by the master to discharge a statutory duty to the servant, and the latter's express or implied acquiescence therein; and yet the servant was given judgment. The reasons stated in some of these cases for the conclusion are not entirely satisfactory, and in the cases from Illinois and Indiana no distinction is made between the doctrine of assumption of risk and of contributory negligence, but they are all authorities on their facts for our conclusion. The case of Knisley v. Pratt, 148 N. Y. 382, 32 L. R. A. 367, 42 N. E. 980, however, presented the precise question for decision, and the court of appeals held expressly that a servant, by continuing in the employment of a master who is violating a statute passed to protect the servant, does assume the risk of danger from such violation, and cannot make it the ground of recovery. This is followed by the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit in a New York case. E. S. Higgins Carpet Co. v. O'Keefe, 51 U. S. App. 74, 79 Fed. Rep. 900, 25 C. C. A. 220. The court of appeals of New York, in Huda v. American Glucose Co. 154 N. Y. 474, 482, 40 L. R. A. 411, 48 N. E. 897, does not treat the question decided in the Knisley Case as controlling the case of servants acquiescing in and assuming the risk of a violation of a fire-escape statute by their master, and the court declined to decide it. The decision in the Knisley Case is largely based on the decision of O'Maley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. 158 Mass. 135, 47 L. R. A. 161, 32 N. E. 1119, and Goodridge v. Washington Mills Co. 160 Mass. 234, 35 N. E. 494. We think the learned court of appeals of New York failed to observe that the O'Maley and Goodridge Cases were not suits under a statute defining and enjoining a specific duty of a master for the protection of servants, but were suits under an employer's liability act, which relieved the servant from the burden of certain defenses by the master in suits for injury sustained by him while in his master's employ, but did not attempt to change the master's duty to the servant, or to change the standard of negligence between them as that was fixed at common law. Hence it was held by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts that the doctrine of assumption of risk applied to suits under the statute as at common law, and Thomas v. Quartermaine, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 685, which was also a suit under an employer's liability act, was much relied on. And yet in Thomas v. Quartermaine, as we have seen, the two lord justices, forming the majority deciding the case, expressly pointed out that in a suit under a statute positively fixing a standard of duty the doctrine of assumption of risk could not be applied. The distinction between the employer's liability act and acts for the protection of servants in the nature of police legislation, like the act under consideration, is clearly shown in Griffiths v. Dudley, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 357, where, though the court held that a servant might "contract the employer out" of liability under the former act, it was said that this could not be done in respect of liability arising under a statute like the one at bar, passed for the protection of servants. The Knisley Case, which, in our judgment, was wrongly decided, and many others in which a right conclusion was reached, seem to us to confuse an agreement to assume the risk of an employment, as it is known to be to the servant, and his contributory negligence. That, under certain circumstances, the one sometimes comes very near the other, and cannot easily be distinguished from the other, may be conceded; but in most cases there is a broad line of distinction, and it is so in this case. For years employees worked in railroad yards in which blocks were not used, and yet no one would charge them with negligence in so doing. The switches and rails were mere perils of the employment. Assumption of risk is in such cases the acquiescence of an ordinarily prudent man in a known danger, the risk of which he assumes by contract. Contributory negligence in such cases is that action or nonaction in disregard of personal safety by one who, treating the known danger as a condition, acts with respect to it without due care of its consequences. The distinction has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States. In Union P. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 101 U. S. 451, 40 L. ed. 766, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 618, the court said: "The second instruction was properly refused because it confused two distinct propositions,—that relating to the risks assumed by an employee in entering a given service, and that relating to the amount of vigilance that should be exercised under given circumstances."

In Hesse v. Columbus, S. & H. R. Co. 58 Ohio St. 167, 169, 50 N. E. 355, Judge Shauk, speaking for the supreme court of Ohio, said: "Acquiescence with knowledge is not synonymous with contributory negligence. One having full knowledge of defects in machinery with which he is employed may use the utmost care to avert the dangers which they threaten."

The distinction is exceedingly well brought out in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Baker, 63 U. S. App. 553, 91 Fed. Rep. 224, 33 C. C. A. 468, by Judge Woods, speaking for the circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit. There the action was for damages against a railroad company for injury sustained by reason of a breach of a Federal statute requiring the company to furnish grab irons. The statute, out of abundant caution, expressly provides that the continued service of the employee with knowledge of the breach of statutory duty by the company should not be regarded as an assumption of the risk. The court held that this proviso did not prevent the company from successfully maintaining the defense of contributory negligence. Assumption of risk and contributory negligence approximate where the danger is so obvious and imminent that no ordinarily prudent man would assume the risk of injury therefrom. But where the danger, though present and appreciated, is one which many men are in the habit of assuming, and which prudent men who must earn a living are willing to assume for extra compensation, one who assumes the risk cannot be said to be guilty of contributory negligence if, having in view the risk of danger assumed, he uses care reasonably commensurate with the risk to avoid injurious consequences. One who does not use such care, and who, by reason thereof, suffers injury, is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover, because he, and not the master, causes the injury, or because they jointly cause it. Many authorities hold that contributory negligence is a defense to an action founded on a violation of statutory duty, and this undoubtedly is the proper view. Such is the case of Krause v. Morgan, 53 Ohio St. 26, 40 N. E. 886, where the employee, in spite of a warning from his superior, and in the face of the most palpable danger, exposed himself to certain injury, and then sought to hold his employer liable because he had not employed the statutory methods of protecting him from the danger. In Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Craig, 37 U. S. App. 654, 73 Fed. Rep. 642, 19 C. A. 631, we held that the Krause Case was one of contributory negligence, and followed it as such. The syllabus confuses the difference between assumption of risk and contributory negligence, but the syllabus and opinion are, of course, to be restrained to the facts. The following cases, relied on by counsel for the railway company, were also cases of contributory negligence in suits for violation of specific statutory duty: Pittsburgh & W. Coal Co. v. Estievenard, 53 Ohio St. 43, 40 N. E. 725; Victor Coal Co. v. Muir, 20 Colo. 320, 26 L. R. A. 435, 38 Pac. 378; Holum v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 80 Wis. 299, 60 N. W. 99; Grand v. Michigan C. R. Co. 83 Mich. 564, 11 L. R. A. 402, 47 N. W. 837; and Taylor v. Carew Mfg. Co. 143 Mass. 470, 10 N. E. 308. In the last two cases the distinction between contributory negligence and assumption of risk is clearly referred to.

For the reasons given, we think the court below was in error in holding that the plaintiff assumed the risk of injury from the failure of the defendant to comply with the statute passed for his protection, and that the case should have been submitted to the jury on the issue whether, assuming the unblocked guard rails and frogs as a condition of the situation, he used due care to avoid injury therefrom.

Judgment reversed, at costs of the defendant, with directions to order a new trial.

Petition for certiorari to remove case to Supreme Court of United States denied October 16, 1899.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

SUCCESSION OF Francois MEUNIER.

(52 La. Ann. 79.)

- *1. The judgment appealed from annulled the will and the probate thereof, and recognized plaintiffs as heirs of the deceased. But it did not in terms send them into possession, nor was there an award against the executors, specifically, for a sum as representing the net proceeds of the estate in their hands. Held, a case where the trial judge could fix the amount of the suspensive appeal bond.
2. One of the executors, acting in his individual capacity, was competent as surety on such appeal bond for the legatee who had appealed.
3. Objection that the appeal was taken in the name of the agent and attorney in fact of the legatee, instead of in the name of the legatee, held, under the facts and pleadings of the case, not tenable.
4. Donations and bequests are permissible to trustees for educational, charitable, or literary purposes, or for the benefit of institutions, existing or to be founded, the object of which is to promote education, literature, or charity. Act 1882, No. 124.

5. But this permission is restricted to educational, charitable, and literary objects within the state of Louisiana, and to institutions founded and to be founded under the laws of the state for such purposes.
6. To avoid the dispositions of wills and testaments, it must plainly appear that they come within the prohibitions of the law.
7. Where a bequest in a will in one view is illegal, and in another view lawful, the latter will be adopted, and the will sustained.
8. A legacy to the commune of Carrouge, canton of Geneva, Switzerland, which is directed to be placed at interest, and with the interest to endow annually two poor girls, and to give a pension to ten old persons of the two sexes, is held to be a legacy to pious and charitable uses, and sustainable.

Mr. Charles Louque, for appellants:

In 1882 the legislature passed act No. 124, p. 172, which irrevocably made the doctrine of charitable trusts a part of our system of laws.

Under this act, the state courts are bound to apply and enforce the full doctrines of charitable trusts.

The jurisdiction of the chancery courts has been recognized in all the states of this Union, and their jurisprudence has been applied uniformly to all charities of the nature of Francois Meunier's bequests.

Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 192, 11 L. ed. 231; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1136 et seq.; Perry, Tr. §§ 689 et seq.

Under the act of 1882 substitutions and fidei commissi, which were prohibited, are now permissible, as regards charitable trusts.

Supposing that the commune was incapable of acting as trustee, the charitable bequest is nevertheless good.

Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 197, 11 L. ed. 233; Perry, Tr. §§ 722-731, and note; Handley v. Palmer, 91 Fed. Rep. 949.

It is a maxim of the court never to allow a certain and valid trust to fail for want of a trustee.

Courts look with favor upon charitable bequests, and endeavor to carry them into effect.

Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1169, 1170, 1181; Perry, Tr. § 709.

It is immaterial whether the person to take be in esse or not, or the legatee was, at the time of the bequest, a corporation capable of taking or not.

The legislature could incorporate the trustees afterwards.

If the beneficiaries were so named that the trustees would have no discretion, the bequest would not be classed as public charity.

Mr. G. V. Soniat, for appellees:

A last will, which orders all the properties of the testator to be sold and the sums realized to be placed at interest, and with the interest to endow, each year, two poor girls, and to give pensions to ten old persons of the two sexes, does not convey full ownership to the legatee; it creates a trust estate, and thereby violates the law.

Civil Code, 1520; Perin v. McMicken, 15 La. Ann. 154; Kernan's Succession, 52 La. Ann. 48, 26 So. 749; Harper v. Stanbrough, 2 La. Ann. 380; Franklin's Succession, 7 La. Such a will is also void on account of uncertainty in the beneficiaries; and their choice being left to the city of Carouge, the nominal donee, would make this a testament by the intervention of a commissary or attorney in fact, and thereby the same contravenes a prohibitory law.

Civil Code, 1573; Fink v. Fink, 12 La. Ann. 301.

The city of Carouge, Switzerland, is incapable of receiving a legacy of realty situated in Louisiana, because—

(a) The treaty of 1850, passed between Switzerland and the United States, limits such inheritances to citizens of the contracting parties. A city is not a citizen, and therefore the city of Carouge cannot inherit.

(b) Because the said treaty expressly states that "the foregoing privilege (of acquiring property, etc.), however, shall not extend to the exercise of political rights, etc."

(c) The want of capacity in the city of Carouge at the death of the testator, resulting from a positive prohibition in the laws of Switzerland prohibiting cities to receive any legacy burdened with a condition, cannot be supplied, cured, or removed by a subsequent permission from the legislative body of Switzerland.

First Congregational Church v. Henderson, 4 Rob. (La.) 210; New Orleans v. Hardie, 43 La. Ann. 251, 9 So. 12; Rachal v. Rachal, 1 Rob. (La.) 115.

(d) Act 124 of 1882 is restrictive to corporations organized under the laws of Louisiana. It is evident that a city in Switzerland cannot organize as a corporation for charitable purposes under the laws of Louisiana.

La. Rev. Stat. 677; Franklin's Succession, 7 La. Ann. 416.

On application for rehearing.

Mr. J. McConnell, also for appellees:

The opinion declares in terms that "the will in question is not obnoxious to the maxim Le mort saisit le vif, for the title of the estate is immediately vested in the commune of Carouge." This conclusion, as the executors had no seisin, made the town of Carouge immediately, on the death of Meunier, acquire the title to the stores on Royal street and other property described in the will.

Cross, Succession, p. 44; Addison v. New Orleans Sav. Bank, 15 La. 527; Brooks v. Norris, 6 Rob. (La.) 183; Calvit v. Mulhollan, 12 Rob. (La.) 258; Womack v. Womack, 2 La. Ann. 339.

This conclusion is necessary because it is essential that the heir of the decedent, whether testamentary or legal, should acquire the succession immediately. It follows, therefore, that the court sanctions this will as a valid title to the stores on Royal street in New Orleans, in favor of this municipal corporation acquiring real estate here, although created and existing under a foreign European government. Such a result is condemned both by municipal and international law.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 435, p. 533.

The testamentary executors did not have the seisin. This being the case, the sale made by the executors was unauthorized by law.

Indefiniteness is of the essence of charity when exercised by municipal corporations. Such charities must be of a catholic or universal character.

Blanchard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Francois Meunier died, leaving a last will and testament, olographic in form, by which he bequeathed to the city of Carouge, canton of Geneva, Switzerland (his native city), all the property in the city of New Orleans owned by him, consisting of several pieces of real estate, shares of stock, money, and bills due him, all of the aggregate value of about $25,000. He directed this property to be sold, and then followed a declaration to the effect that the city of Carouge "shall place the said sum at interest, and with the interest shall endow each year two poor girls, and shall give a pension to ten old persons of the two sexes, without any distinction of religion." He named Jerome Meunier, Joseph Bayle, and Emile Hoehn as testamentary executors. The will was admitted to probate, the executors were confirmed as such, and letters testamentary issued to them. Subsequently, collateral heirs of the deceased, his first cousins, residing in Switzerland and France, presented a petition for the annulment of the will. 48 L. R. A.

They represented that the deceased left no ascendants nor descendants, and that they, with others mentioned, were his closest of kin and sole heirs. The will is attacked as being against public policy and in derogation of the laws of the state of Louisiana, where the properties it deals with are situated, and where the will is to have effect. It is averred that the city of Carouge is a foreign municipal corporation, incapable of receiving and taking charge of an estate here; that the dispositions of the will in its favor are not sanctioned by the laws of Louisiana, nor by the treaty ratified between the United States and the Swiss Republic; that the laws of Switzerland did not at the date of the execution of the will, nor that of the probate thereof, authorize the city of Carouge to accept the legacy burdened with the conditions stipulated; and that no comity in this respect exists between the state of Louisiana, or the United States, and Switzerland. As further ground of avoiding the will, it is charged that the bequest to the city of Carouge creates a trust, or fidei commissum, obnoxious to the law of Louisiana; that by the terms of the will the said city is not vested with full ownership of the property or funds bequeathed, but, on the contrary, is required to invest the funds, and to hold the same in trust perpetually for the purpose of endowing each year "two poor girls" and pensioning "ten old persons," whose existence is uncertain, and whose names, residences, and nationality are not given; and that this is an attempt to will by testament, through the intervention of a commissary or attorney in fact, and constitutes a prohibited substitution. The petitioners represent that, with the will declared void, the inheritance of the property of the deceased devolves upon them, under the laws of Louisiana, and the treaties in force between Switzerland and the United States. The judgment of the court a qua sustained the opposition to the will, decreed its nullity, and recognized the claimants as heirs at law of the deceased. An order for a suspensive appeal from this decree was taken by the executors and the representative of the city of Carouge.

Motion to Dismiss Appeal.

A motion is made here to dismiss the appeal on several grounds, one of which is that the record is incomplete. It suffices to say, we do not find it so.

Another ground is that the trial court was without authority to fix the amount of the suspensive appeal bond, and that no appeal suspending the execution of the judgment could be taken without the giving of a bond exceeding by one half the sum of $15,387.50, which was the net amount of the estate left in the hands of the executors after the payment of the debts of the deceased and the expenses of administration. The bond given was for less than the sum mentioned, but was for the amount fixed by the court. The judgment appealed from annulled the will and the probate thereof. It further recognized the petitioners as heirs of the deceased, and as such entitled to the dead man's estate. But it did not, in terms, send them into possession. There was no order directing the recognized heirs to be put into possession. Neither did the judgment mention the amount of the net proceeds of the estate then in the hands of the executors. There was no judgment against the executors, specifically, for a sum as representing such proceeds. Under these circumstances, it was a case where the district judge was empowered to grant a suspensive appeal, and fix the amount of the bond to be given as such. Edwards' Succession, 34 La. Ann. 216; Ooyle v. Creevy, 34 La. Ann. 539; State ex rel. Durand v. Parish Judge, 30 La. Ann. 285; Oloney's Succession, 29 La. Ann. 327.

A further objection is that the only party who signed the bond as surety is Edward Hoehn, who, in his capacity of coexecutor, is appellant herein. The contention is that Hoehn individually cannot be surety for Hoehn, executor, appellant. Neither can he. State v. Probate Ct. Judge, 2 Rob. (La.) 449; Lafon v. Lafon, 2 Mart. N. S. 571. It may be, too (though on this we express no opinion), that Hoehn, in his individual capacity, is not competent as surety for his coexecutor Jerome Meunier on an appeal bond given by the two executors. It is not necessary to decide this question, for Hoehn individually was clearly competent as surety on the appeal bond for the other appellant, the city of Carouge. Even, therefore, were the appeal held not good as to the executors, it must be maintained as to the real party in interest, the legatee under the will, and this necessarily would bring the case before us on its merits.

But it is contended the city of Carouge has not appealed. This contention is based on the fact that the motion and bond of appeal recite that "Louis Rittener, the duly-qualified agent of the commune of Carouge," appeals. It is urged that this is not an appeal by the city of Carouge. We find that citation in this proceeding to annul the will was prayed for against "the city of Carouge, Switzerland, through her accredited agent, Louis Rittener;" that the answer of the city of Carouge to the demand reads, "into court comes Louis Rittener, the duly-qualified agent and attorney in fact of the commune of Carouge," etc.; and that the judgment upon the issues made up by this answer is against "the city of Carouge, Switzerland, herein represented by Louis Rittener, its duly-qualified agent and attorney in fact." Under these circumstances, while the way in which the appeal was taken and the bond drawn may be objectionable from the standpoint of technically correct pleading, the appeal taken by the party filing the answer which joined the issue, and who is recognized in appellees' pleadings as the agent and attorney in fact of the city of Carouge, must be held to be the appeal of the latter. The motion to dismiss is denied.

On the Merits.

Testamentary substitutions and fidei com-

missa, have been prohibited in this state from the earliest times. This prohibition was established in the interest of public order and state policy, and held to embrace within its scope the trust estates of the common law. Numerous decisions of this court attest the jealous care with which this policy of the law has been enforced. From the adoption of the Code of Louisiana of 1808 down to the year 1882, no legislative enactment appreciably modified its force, or weakened the stringency of its application to testamentary dispositions. In the latter year, however, a marked divergence from the beaten path of the law in this respect appeared among the statutes of the state. Act No. 124 of the Acts of 1882 was adopted, the object of which is to exempt all donations mortis causa or inter vivos made to trustees for educational, charitable, or literary purposes, or for the benefit of educational, literary, or charitable institutions already existing or to be founded, from the operation of the laws of the state relative to substitutions, trusts, and fidei commissa. It is part of the history of the state of that period that this departure from, or, rather, modification of, the ancient policy of the law, was coincident with the munificent dispositions made, or then about to be made, by the venerable and philanthropic Paul Tulane for the laudable purpose of founding in the city of New Orleans, where his active life had been spent and his fortune amassed, a great university, which, bearing his name, stands today alike a justification of the aforesaid modification of the law of trusts, a monument to his memory, and a blessing to mankind. As the law of Louisiana now stands, therefore, donations and bequests can be made to trustees for educational, charitable, or literary purposes, or for the benefit of institutions, existing or to be founded, the object of which is to promote education, literature, or charity. But it is clear from the language of the act of 1882 that its intention is to restrict this permission to educational, charitable, and literary objects within the state of Louisiana, and to institutions founded or to be founded under the laws of the state for such purposes. As the city of Carouge, a political institution in a foreign jurisdiction, can never exercise authority of any kind within the state of Louisiana, nor incorporate itself under our laws, nor authorize trustees to incorporate themselves here for the purpose of dispensing charity, it must be held that the act of 1882 can have no bearing, operation, or effect on the legacy under consideration, and no influence in the settlement of the question raised. It is equally clear that the charity intended by the bequest of the testator was to find its practical application in Switzerland, and not in Louisiana. We may therefore dismiss the act of 1882 from further consideration. The legacy to the city of Carouge is to be judged by the codal provisions of the law as the same stood prior to the act of 1882, and stand or fall according as it may or may not measure up to the requirements of a valid testamentary disposition. The question, then, just now to deal with, is, Does this bequest evidence a substitution of fidei commissum prohibited by the law?

To create a substitution is to bequeath property to one or more, to be succeeded in the enjoyment thereof by others designated by the testator. The fidei commissum is to bequeath property to be held for and delivered to another. It is a mandate or trust, with no interest conferred on the legatee, who is charged only to preserve and deliver. McCan's Succession, 48 La. Ann. 157, 19 So. 220. It is a charge to receive for and deliver to another. [Mathurin v. Livaudais] 5 Mart. N. S. 303. To fail, this legacy must come clearly within the scope of one or the other of these prohibitions, for the law and the courts lean to the upholding of the dispositions made by testators of their estates. Eminent civilians have declared that, "wherever the testamentary power has been established, a will or testament is an exertion of human liberty and of human volition over property;" and by others truly has it been said that "the last will of those who depart this life is the last expression of their love, friendship, and gratitude," to be regarded as sacred, and, where it violates no law, to be respected, even as the grave of the dead is respected. Michon Succession, 30 La. Ann. 217. To anathematize the dispositions of wills, to decree them null, it must clearly appear they come within the prohibitions of the law. Cole v. Cole, 7 Mart. N. S. 416. A doubt existing must be resolved in favor of their validity. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1713; McCluskey v. Webb, 4 Rob. (La.) 204; Duclosange's Succession, 4 Rob. (La.) 409; [Cole v. Cole] 7 Mart. N. S. 417; Farrar v. McCutcheon, 4 Mart. N. S. 47; Arnaud v. Tarbe, 4 La. 504; State v. McDonogh, 8 La. Ann. 173; Auld's Succession, 44 La. Ann. 593, 10 So. 877.

The argument against the will is it was the intent of the testator that the commune of Carouge should have his estate, and be charged with the duty or trust to preserve the same for indefinite third persons, to wit, "two poor girls," and "ten old persons of the two sexes," to whom, annually, its profits should be paid,—not to the same "two poor girls" and "ten old persons" each year, but to such persons fulfilling that designation whom, each year, the commune may, in its discretion, select as beneficiaries of the charity. The requirement is that it be paid out each year to such persons. As to that, the commune has no discretion, but has discretion as to the choice of persons to become the recipients of the bounty, provided they are "poor girls," in the one instance, and "old persons," in the other instance. The argument, further, is that, while this clause in the will may not constitute a substitution, it does create a trust and fidei commissum; that it is a bequest in trust to the city of Carouge, which is charged with the duty of holding, preserving, administering, and investing the legacy, and applying its profits to the amelioration of the condition of certain indefinite and innominate persons, to wit, two poor girls and ten old persons; that the city is the instrumentality made use of by the testator for preserving and conveying his estate to the indefinite persons named; that if the bequest had been made to "two poor girls" and "ten old persons," residents of the city of Carouge, it would be void for uncertainty (for instance, what "two poor girls," what "ten old persons"); that, to avoid this uncertainty, the bequest is made to the city of Carouge as trustee to select the "two poor girls" and "ten old persons" who annually shall be the beneficiaries of the bounty of the testator; that thus to the city of Carouge a commission in perpetual trust is given to be executed; that the funds representing the legacy are to remain unimpaired, are to be preserved indefinitely, and the proceeds of the investment of the same are to be distributed by the city as the commissary or attorney in fact of the testator, to the girls and old persons annually who may be selected by the trustee; and that the clause in the will, therefore, is a testamentary disposition committing to the choice of a third person the institution of the beneficiary of the will, and comes under the express ban and prohibition of article 1573 of the Revised Civil Code. This argument would prevail if it were the only interpretation of which the will is susceptible. But there is another view to be taken of the will, and we think a legal one. While the testator willed his estate, real and personal, in Louisiana, to the commune of Carouge, he directed his executors to sell the property, and to convert all the effects of the estate into cash, and to transmit the funds thus derived to the legatee. The executors have obeyed this injunction by selling the property, and the proceeds thus derived, minus the debts and charges of the administration, are the subject of this controversy. This will therefore does not complicate the simple tenures by which alone our laws permit the property to be held, nor does it tie up indefinitely, and take out of commerce, the property of the succession. Money was really the thing donated, and it was contemplated it should be used by the legatee so as to produce an annual revenue, which is not to be preserved and returned to another, but is to be applied to pious or charitable purposes. The title intended is one to the city of Carouge in full ownership, with a destination to pious or charitable uses. Such a disposition is lawful, and may be carried into effect if the uses to which it is to be put be such for which the city would be otherwise bound to provide. One of the directions of the will is to provide for old persons of the two sexes, and one of the duties recognized in all enlightened countries as resting upon communities incorporated into cities is to care for the indigent. State v. McDonogh, 8 La. Ann. 259. Legacies for pious uses are described to be those which are destined to some work of piety or object of charity. Id. 171. They are not only not prohibited by the law, but viewed with favor. Ibid. It is no objection to the validity of a legacy to pious uses that it is for the benefit of the poor. The legatee of such a legacy is vested with the title, even though the destination affixed to the property by the testator follow it in his possession. Id. 172. The law makes no distinction between a legacy to the poor of a city, and a legacy to the city for the poor. In both cases it is a legacy for pious uses, and the city is the recipient. McDonogh Will Case, 8 La. Ann. 247. Legacies for pious uses are recognized by the law for the purpose of procuring aid from individuals in supplying those wants which the state itself, or the communities into which it is divided, are bound to provide for in the interest of society, and as a function of government, falling within the circle or coming within the scope of the duties of government. Id. 249. The police and good order of a city include the education of youth, and the care of the poor within its limits. Deduced at first from the principles of Christianity, it has become an elementary principle in the theory of government. Id. 255; Domat, Des Comm. 107.

When analyzed, the provisions of this will are found to be lawful, simple, and reasonable; to contain nothing hostile to any consideration of public policy. There is no trust created by it. The bequest is absolute to the city of Carouge for all time, burdened only with a charge to dedicate it to pious and charitable uses. It is not obnoxious to the maxim, Le mort saisit le vif, for the title of the estate is immediately vested in the commune of Carouge. It is not to be surrendered at any time to anyone. No one is named, to whom the estate is to be transmitted. The direction that the proceeds of the property are to be placed at interest, and the profits thus derived are to be used in the way indicated in the will, does not bring it within the scope of the prohibitions of the law. This direction is, we think, more to be regarded as in the nature of a request to the legatee. It was the expression of a wish, a desire. It was not a disposition. It was advice and recommendation. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1713, we think, authorizes this meaning to be given to the words. 8 La. Ann. 237. It will be observed that it was only with regard to the interest on the fund representing the estate that any request is made or direction given, and even that is not required to be preserved for or disbursed to any particular person named. In a general way two poor girls and ten old persons annually are directed to be aided from the profits of the fund; but this must be held to be within the discretion of the commune, as to the persons to be aided, for no particular poor girls or old persons are invested with the right of enforcing the disposition. This does not come within the scope of fidei commissum, which, as we have seen, is understood to be a disposition, causa mortis, by which the heir or legatee is requested to give or return a certain thing to another person. Dom. lib. 4, title 2, § 2. By "another person" is meant a person or institution so named or indicated as to individualize him or her or it. That is not the case here. This bequest is to the city of Carouge, and to it alone. 8 La. Ann. 172. It was in no sense a legacy to any other person. The direction to use the interest for a given purpose did not vest any part of the legacy in any particular person as beneficiary thereof. The city of Carouge is instituted universal legatee. By virtue of this institution, it is clothed with full right of ownership over the funds of the succession. There is and can be no substitute to take the estate at any time. The city has perpetual existence. It is a moral person, perpetually renewed by the successive renewal of its inhabitants. While this legacy to it is to be viewed as one burdened with the charge of a specific destination for the behoof of the city, the latter is not encumbered with the duty of returning it at any time to anyone. It is an obligation consisting in faciendo, nothing more. 8 La. Ann. 230. It is a gift to the city made in presenti, with the charge of specific destination; and, since taking care of the destitute is a duty devolving on municipalities, this legacy is really to be viewed as one to the city of Carouge, with the charge of investment for its own interest. The most that can be said against the legacy is that it is one with a charge. But this does not make it a fidei commissum, for, under the law, charges and conditions may be placed on all heirs and legatees, except forced heirs as to their légitime. We hold that the city of Carouge, under the proper view to be taken of this will, is in no sense a trustee. It holds the legal estate of the property or funds donated to it. The terms of the will are terms of disposal. They express the transfer of ownership from the person of the testator to the legatee. The disposition and control of the fund after it is placed in the city's hands would be in virtue of ownership, not trusteeship. The testator did not devise the legacy to persons needing and entitled to receive charity, though it was the object and intention that needy persons are to be benefited by it, if carried out. Burke's Succession, 51 La. Ann. 538, 25 So. 387; New Orleans v. Hardie, 43 La. Ann. 255, 9 So. 12. But, even if the legacy had been devised directly to the poor of the city of Carouge, it would come within the letter of the law, for the city could and would take charge of it and administer it for the beneficiaries. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1549; Fink v. Fink, 12 La. Ann. 301; [State v. McDonogh] 8 La. Ann. 256. We think the needy persons intended to be benefited by the provision of the will are those of the city of Carouge coming within the description of the will.

This case, we think, comes within the rule of those decisions of this court of which Milne v. Milne, 17 La. 46, the McDonogh Will Case, 8 La. Ann. 171, and the Western Star Lodge Case, 38 La. Ann. 620, are types, rather than within the rule of those decisions of which Franklin's Succession, 7 La. Ann. 395, is a type. The case of Burke's Succession, 51 La. Ann. 538, 25 So.

387, cited by plaintiffs, is not in point; and that of Kernan's Succession, 52 La. Ann. 48, 26 So. 749, is to be differentiated from the instant case. There the devise was to Archbishop Janssens, of the diocese of Louisiana, and to his successors, of certain real property (lots and houses) in the city of New Orleans "upon condition that out of the revenues or rents thereof an asylum or home for the poor of both sexes shall be founded, endowed, and maintained, similar, so far as possible, to that of St. Michael's in the city of Rome, Italy." Sustaining the attack of the heirs on the will on the ground that it sought to create a fidei commissum, and proposed a prohibited substitution, the court said: "Whether we hold the church or the archbishop to be the legatee, we are confronted with the difficulty arising from the title the will seeks to create. The will conveys no ownership. The title, such as it is, is one of mere administration. Whether held by the church or the archbishop, the property is to be forever inalienable." The court held the will obnoxious in seeking to introduce an impossible and illegal tenure, and that no such title as that conveyed has any place under our system of laws. Here the real bequest was a legacy of money, for the will directed the sale of the property, the proceeds of which were devised to the city of Carouge for pious and charitable uses. No property here was to be held forever inalienable. Had the argument advanced by plaintiff in the case at bar been sustained in the McDonogh Will Case, where substantially it was made, the munificent bequests made by that philanthropist to the cause of education in the cities of New Orleans and Baltimore would have failed, and the enduring monuments to his memory, in the form of commodious and substantial public-school buildings which dot the former city all over, would never have been erected. Had it been made and sustained against the bequest of Alexander Milne in 1841, the town of Fochabers, in Scotland, would never have enjoyed the bounty of its native son, who, amassing a fortune here, devised a portion thereof ($100,000) to that municipality for the establishment and maintenance of free schools, and the Duke of Richmond's suit in its behalf [Richmond v. Milne] 17 La. 320, 36 Am. Dec. 613, would have been in vain. If it had been made by the legal heirs of James Smithson in the courts of Great Britain, and sustained, against the princely bequest of £100,000 sterling devised by that enlightened Englishman to the United States for the purpose of founding at the capital of the Republic a great scientific institution "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," the Smithsonian Institute would not to-day be in existence. The law of Louisiana is not the illiberal institution the argument against the validity of Francois Meunier's will presupposes. We find nothing prohibitive of the transmission of the funds of the legacy to the commune of Carouge, there to be dedicated to the charitable uses intended by the testator.

But it is insisted the city of Carouge is incapable of receiving the legacy, and one of the grounds advanced for this contention is that the treaty of 1850 between the United States and the Swiss Republic restricts the right of acquiring property in the territory of the other to citizens, and that this excludes the city of Carouge, which cannot be held included within the term "citizens." The city of Carouge is a political corporation,—such a one as is defined by our Code as "an intellectual body." Rev. Civ. Code, art. 427. It is a college of inhabitants, the members of which succeed each other, so that the body continues always the same, notwithstanding the change of the individuals which compose it, and which, for certain purposes, is considered as a natural person. Ibid. Such corporations are substituted for persons, may possess an estate, have a common treasury, and are capable of receiving legacies and donations. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 433. It is too narrow a construction, therefore, which excludes the city of Carouge from the benefits of the first and fifth articles of the treaty with the Swiss confederation. The latter article gives to heirs (whether by testament or without) of citizens of each of the contracting parties the right to succeed to property, to inherit it and take possession thereof, with the further stipulation that one who, on account of being an alien, cannot hold real property (if such be the case), is to be accorded the right to sell same and remove the proceeds. Our law declares, "All persons may dispose or receive by donation inter vivos or mortis causa, except such as the law expressly declares incapable." Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1470. Cities and corporations are ranked among persons, and they are not incapable. "Corporations are placed by our laws on the same footing as natural persons, as to their capacity to take by devise." [Milne v. Milne] 17 La. 54. "Donations inter vivos and mortis causa may be made in favor of a stranger, when the laws of his country do not prohibit similar dispositions from being made in favor of a citizen of this state." Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1490. The treaty with Switzerland permits citizens, respectively, of the United States and of the Swiss Republic, to make such dispositions of property in favor of each other; and the laws of Switzerland do not prohibit dispositions of property from being made in favor of citizens of this state or of the United States. The procureur général of Switzerland certifies that no law of that confederation places any obstacle in the way of the acceptance of a legacy of the nature of that of Francois Meunier's will, when the council of state authorizes the acceptance, and it is shown that this authorization has been duly given. But it is insisted, as further ground for the contention that the city of Carouge is incapable of receiving the legacy, that this authorization by the council of state was necessary because the legacy contained a charge, and the law of Switzerland does not permit municipalities to accept "any legacy or donation containing any charges or conditions." From this the argument proceeds that at the time of the death of the testator, and the probate of his will, the legatee, city of Carouge, did not possess the capacity of inheriting or taking the legacy; that the legal heirs did; and that the ownership and seisin thus invested in the latter could not by any subsequent event be taken away. We do not find that there is any prohibition in the laws of Switzerland against municipalities accepting legacies,—only that, where such legacies contain a charge or condition, the permit of the council of state to accept must be had. The capacity to accept, therefore, exists,—to become executory, however, in case a charge or condition is attached to the legacy, only upon permission being granted by the council of state. Where the legacy contains no charge or condition, the capacity to accept is executory, in full right. Where there is a charge or condition, this capacity to accept is merely suspended until the permit is granted. There was then no want of capacity in the city of Carouge to accept; and when the council of state acted, as it did, and gave the permission to accept, the bar was removed. The case of First Congregational Church v. Henderson, 4 Rob. (La.) 210, cited in opposition to this view, is not in point; for there, at the time of the testator's death, there was a positive prohibition in the charter of the church against receiving any legacy exceeding $1,000. So the court held properly that "the want of capacity at the death of the testator, resulting from a positive statutory prohibition then in force, cannot be supplied, cured, or removed by any subsequent legislative enactment." In the instant case there was no "absence of those qualities required in order to inherit" at the moment the succession was opened. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 950. The legatee here existed at the time the testator died (Rev. Civ. Code, art. 953), and possessed the heritable quality, the exercise of which was merely suspended until permission to accept was had from the council of state. The capacity to receive was one thing, and existed. The exercise of it was another thing, and was merely inoperative until the council of state acted. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1473; Milne v. Milne, 17 La. 46. Many years ago, in this state, Julien Poydras, dying, bequeathed by will $30,000 to the parish of Point Coupée, and a like sum to the parish of West Baton Rouge, the interest on which he directed to be appropriated as dowries to the indigent young women of the parishes, to encourage their marriage. Trouble arising as to the power or capacity of the parishes to accept the legacies, the legislature passed acts authorizing the police juries of the said parishes to accept the same, and it was done. [Milne v. Milne], 17 La. 55; Acts 1825, p. 82; Acts 1837, No. 29.

We hold against plaintiffs on both the grounds urged against the capacity of the city of Carouge to receive and take the legacy, and, deeming the legacy not one coming within the prohibitions of the law, it follows that the will attacked must be sustained as a valid disposition of the testator's estate.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and it is now ordered and decreed that the demand of plaintiffs herein be rejected and dismissed. It is further ordered, etc., that the last will and testament of Francois Meunier, deceased, be sustained as a lawful testamentary disposition of property, and the executors thereof are directed to recognize the city of Carouge, canton of Geneva, Switzerland, as the universal legatee under said will, and to pay over to the said city, or its duly-accredited representative, the funds on hand representing the net proceeds, after payment of the debts of the deceased and the charges of administration, of the sale of the property of the estate of the testator. It is further ordered, etc., that costs of this proceeding in both courts be taxed against plaintiffs.

Breaux, J., concurs in the decree. Monroe, J., having decided the case in the court of first instance, takes no part in the decision on the appeal.

DETROIT, YPSILANTI, & ANN ARBOR RAILWAY, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The duty of a street-railway company to sell tickets in quantities at reduced rates on each car, by virtue of the terms of its franchise, from a certain town from which it runs to a neighboring city, extends to a passenger on the line who gets on the car and offers to buy such tickets at a point outside the town.

2. A street-railway company which has assumed to comply with the terms of its franchise requiring sales of tickets at reduced prices for a certain trip, by providing separate tickets for different parts of the trip, without offering any through-trip tickets for sale, and which has accepted a ticket for one portion of the trip, cannot escape liability for refusing to sell tickets at the reduced price for the remaining part of the trip, on the ground that its franchise obliges it to sell through tickets only.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back an excess of fare paid under protest on de-defendant's cars because of defendant's refusal to sell a trip ticket at less cost. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Emmet Sullivan for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Smith & Curtis and Rice & Meeker for defendant in error.

Montgomery, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant and appellant in this cause is a street railway that maintains and operates a railway between the city of Detroit, the township of Springwells, the village and township of Dearborn, and other places. The cars of the defendant go over the track of the Detroit Citizens' Street-Railway Company to the city hall, in the city of Detroit. Defendant has been selling five tickets for 50 cents, each good for a trip between the city hall, in the city of Detroit, and the village of Dearborn. Each of the five tickets is divided into two parts,—one good from the village of Dearborn to the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad crossing, and the other good between the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad crossing and the city hall, in the city of Detroit. The franchise granted to defendant by the village of Dearborn provided as follows: "It is further provided that the same grantee shall charge not to exceed the following rates, to wit: From any point in said village of Dearborn to Woodward avenue, in the city of Detroit, fifteen (15) cents cash fare, good either way, or two tickets for twenty-five (25) cents, good either way; a strip of five (5) tickets shall be sold for fifty (50) cents." By the terms of the Dearborn franchise, the defendant may charge 5 cents for a ride in said township; and the Springwells franchise permits a charge of 5 cents from the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad crossing to Dearborn township. The plaintiff on the 21st day of July, 1898, in the city of Detroit, boarded a car bound for the village of Dearborn. He gave the conductor a portion of a through ticket which entitled him to ride to the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad crossing, in the township of Springwells. Upon arriving at the crossing the conductor came to take up fare for the trip between the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad crossing and the village of Dearborn. Plaintiff tendered 50 cents, and demanded a sale to him of a strip of five tickets good between the city hall, or Woodward avenue, in the city of Detroit, and the village of Dearborn,—not specially for the purpose of paying his fare to Dearborn with a portion of the strip, but for the purpose of being carried to and fro between the city hall, in the city of Detroit, and the village of Dearborn. The conductor, not having any of these strips or tickets, demanded that the plaintiff pay 10 cents for the trip between the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad crossing and the village of Dearborn, which plaintiff paid under protest. He thereafter brought suit against defendant for 5 cents. A judgment in the circuit court on appeal from the judge was rendered for the plaintiff for 5 cents and costs, by direction of the court.

The pleadings are not printed in the record, so that we must assume that no point was intended to be made as to the sufficiency of the declaration. We have, then, a case in which defendant is operating under a franchise imposing a duty to sell five tickets for 50 cents, good between the city hall, Detroit, and any point in the village of Dearborn. The franchise further provided: "All such tickets shall be kept for sale upon each and every car operated by it." It is contended that the franchise is in force only within the territorial limits of the township, and does not cover territory in other townships. We do not think this contention can be sustained. The franchise is in the nature of a contract, and imposes obligations upon the company which those having occasion to ride from Dearborn to Detroit have a right to enforce. It is urged that the case of Kissane against this same defendant (Mich.) 79 N. W. 1104, is authority for defendant's contention. No such doctrine is announced in that case. It was held, it is true, that the plaintiff was not compelled to rely on the restrictions contained in the franchise granted by the municipality in which he boarded the car, but that he might, under such franchise, pay his fare to a point in another municipality, and there avail himself of the terms of a franchise granted by the latter. The plaintiff's right under this franchise is not different than it would have been had the franchise in Springwells been silent on the subject of fares. The defendant saw fit to contract with the village of Dearborn for a rate outside the limits of the village, and to agree that tickets should be sold on its cars. This contract it cannot repudiate.

But it is urged that no damage was shown, for the reason that the tickets which the defendant was accustomed to sell (consisting, as they did, of two parts) were not the kind of tickets required by the franchise, and that the company was not required to accept the strip from the Flint & Pere Marquette crossing to Dearborn, but was only required to furnish a through ticket. It might be a sufficient answer to say that a failure to sell the tickets to plaintiff when demanded entitled him to nominal damages, at least, and that no more than nominal damages were recovered; but a further answer is that defendant has placed its own construction on the requirements, and has provided tickets in form to suit itself. The plaintiff was entitled, by means of such tickets, to a ride from the city hall to Dearborn for 10 cents. He sought to obtain it by means of the only ticket kept by the defendant for sale. One part of such a ticket had been given up, and, if he had been able to obtain the tickets requested, the remaining portion of the ride could have been paid for with the other coupon.

The judgment is affirmed.

The other Justices concur.

William L. FULLER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS' MUTUAL LIFE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE AS-SOCIATION.

(.....Mich.....)

The amputation of about one fourth of a person's foot does not give any right to the full amount of insurance on the ground that all the use of the foot is lost, under a by-law of a mutual benefit association providing for full payment in case of the "amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot)," as the word "whole" applies to the foot as well as the hand, and the injury insured against is not the loss of the use of a hand or foot, but the amputation of a limb that should include a whole hand or a whole foot.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for St. Clair County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of an amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John B. Mellwain, for plaintiff in error:

If the question should depend upon the extent of plaintiff's disability, the testimony tending to show it should all have been admitted, and the court should have stated the law and left the jury to say whether plaintiff's disability came within the law as given to them.

Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. 112 Mich. 429, 38 L. R. A. 529, 70 N. W. 898; Lord v. American Mut. Acci. Asso. 89 Wis. 19, 26 L. R. A. 741, 61 N. W. 293; Sneck v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 88 Hun, 94, 34 N. Y. Supp. 545; Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 9 L. R. A. 685, 46 N. W. 799.

In a contract of this kind the court will not be inclined to adopt a legal construction varying from the grammatical construction, to the prejudice of the party insured, or to defeat substantial justice.

The contract is open to the construction contended for by plaintiff, and, this being so, the law is well settled that where the provisions in an insurance policy are susceptible of two constructions, the one most favorable for the insured will be adopted.

Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. 112 Mich. 429, 38 L. R. A. 529, 70 N. W. 898; Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 545, 32 N. W. 812; Grand Rapids Electric Light & P. Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 111 Mich. 148, 69 N. W. 249; May, Ins. § 175; Wood, Ins. §§ 60, 62; Allen v. St. Louis Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 473; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 286; Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 H. L. L. ed. 563; Hohn v. Inter-State Casualty Co. 115 Mich. 79, 72 N. W. 1105.

The law does not specify where the foot must be amputated to entitle the insured to recover.

In contracts providing indemnity in case of the "loss of a foot" the decisions are uniform in holding these words to mean "the loss of the use of a foot," and that amputation is not necessary.

Messrs. Phillips & Jenks, for defendant in error:

The policy itself, in the absence of fraud, duress, or mistake, must be looked to, to ascertain the meaning and intent of the parties; and where the contract is clear, precise, and unambiguous in its terms, and the sense is manifest, there is no need of a resort to rules of construction.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a member of a mutual benefit association, and held a certificate which he claims to entitle him to payment of $3,000 under article 19 of the by-laws, which is as follows: "Any member while engaged in any lawful avocation receiving bodily injuries which alone shall cause amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot), or total and permanent loss of eyesight, he shall receive the full amount of his policy." The defendant refuses payment upon the ground that the injury sustained does not bring him within the by-law, for the reason that the injury did not cause amputation of a whole hand or foot. The circuit judge directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The record contains diagrams showing the size and shape of the whole left foot and the maimed right foot. They were made by drawing a pencil around them while the plaintiff stood upon a piece of paper. The length of the whole foot is 11 $\frac{1}{4}$ inches to the end of the great toe, while the amputated foot is exactly 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches on a line drawn through the center of the foot, and 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ inches if drawn in the direction of the great toe. It is thus demonstrated that the foot is shortened 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ inches, which is as nearly one fourth as it well could be. This one fourth is from the toe, and it leaves three fourths of the foot. This would leave all of the heel, and substantially all of the hollow of the foot, and possibly a part of what is called the "ball of the foot." We do not overlook the statement that the skin of the sole was left longer to lap upward over the end, and perhaps part of the top, of the mutilated foot, but this cannot have lengthened it materially. It is claimed that it would be 1 inch. Counsel claim that the proof shows that all use of the foot is lost, and insist that this brings them within the spirit and meaning of the contract. They contend: First, that the contract should be read as though it said, "Foot or whole hand,"—in other words, that the qualifying adjective, "whole," should not be applied to "foot;" and, second, that in any event the whole foot was amputated when it was so far removed as to be useless in the performance of the natural functions of a foot.

The natural construction of the words would be the same as though the by-law had said, "Whole hand or whole foot." Furthermore, the injury insured against is not the amputation of a hand or foot, but a limb; and the words in brackets, "whole hand or foot," are used as explanatory of what was meant by the word "limb," i. e. an amputation, not necessarily a whole arm or leg, at the elbow or knee, but any amputation of a limb that should include a whole hand or a whole foot.

We are cited upon the second proposition to some authorities which are said to hold that, if the beneficial use of a member is lost, there may be a recovery. That would be a reasonable construction of a contract of insurance that should insure against the "loss of a hand or foot," for it might well be said that a foot or hand is lost when it is so impaired as to be of no further use, and that is as far as the authorities have gone. What is meant by the loss of a hand? Ordinarily the term "loss" is obvious, but when it is considered in the light of surrounding circumstances, viz., an insurance policy that indemnifies against the loss of a hand or an entire hand, it is not unreasonable to hold that the parties understood that any injury to the hand which rendered it useless was a loss of the hand or entire hand. In Sheanon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 618, 9 L. R. A. 685, 46 N. W. 799, where "an insurance policy provided that the principal sum should be paid if the insured, from a violent and accidental injury which should be externally visible, should 'suffer the loss of the entire sight of both eyes, or the loss of two entire hands or two entire feet, or one entire hand and one entire foot,' the insured was accidentally shot in the back; the bullet penetrating his spine, and producing immediate and total paralysis of the lower part of his body, and entirely destroying the use of both feet. Held, that he had suffered 'the loss of two entire feet,' within the meaning of the policy." The court said: "The question is, Does the policy cover such an injury? The policy covers both death and indemnity; the company agreeing to pay the principal sum if the insured, from a violent and accidental injury which should be externally visible, should 'suffer the loss of the entire sight of both eyes, or the loss of two entire hands or two entire feet, or one entire hand and one entire foot.' This is the language of the policy, and the question is, What does it mean, or what must be understood by it? Is its meaning that the insured is not entitled to recover the insurance money unless his legs and feet have been amputated or severed from his body, or does it mean that the injury must have destroyed the entire use of his legs and feet, so that they will perform no function whatever? The contention of the learned counsel for the defendant is that the clause is to be understood in the former sense, and implies an amputation or physical severance of the feet from the body, and does not include an injury such as paralysis, though such injury actually deprives the insured of all use of his feet and legs. We cannot adopt such a construction of the contract. To our minds the loss of the hands and feet embraced in the policy is an actual and entire loss of their use as members of the body; and if their use is actually destroyed, so that they will perform no function whatever, then they are lost as hands and feet. In ordinary and popular parlance, when a person is deprived of the use of a limb we say he has lost it. This is the ordinary sense attached to the word when used in such a connection. Now, if the feet and hands cannot be used for the purpose of moving about or walking, or for holding and handling things, they are in fact lost as much as though actually severed from the body. The expression 'loss of feet' would generally be understood to mean a loss of the use of these members; and if the lower portions of the plaintiff's body and his feet are completely paralyzed, and he is permanently and forever deprived of their use, he has suffered 'a loss of two entire feet,' within the meaning of the policy." The next case in chronological order to which our attention is called is Stevens v. People's Mut. Acci. Ins. Asso. 150 Pa. 132, 16 L. R. A. 446, 24 Atl. 662. There it was held that "an accident policy insuring against involuntary, external, violent, and accidental injuries, and not against disease of any kind, or against disabilities which are the result wholly or in part of disease or bodily infirmities, and providing for a stipulated indemnity for partial permanent disablement, which is defined to be the loss of one hand or foot or both eyes, does not cover the case of indemnity for an injury where the foot is not lost or injured, and it may be used constantly by means of an appliance of a plaster jacket to the spine, although the foot could not be used if the appliance were removed." It was held that he had neither lost the foot nor the use of it. The case of Sneck v. Travellers' Ins. Co. is next in order of time. This case was tried twice, and is reported in 81 Hun, 331, 30 N. Y. Supp. 881, and 88 Hun, 94, 34 N. Y. Supp. 545. The understanding in that case was based upon a "loss by severance of one entire hand or foot." At the first review the court held that it was error to submit the case to the jury where the proof showed that the hand was removed a short distance back of the knuckle. Bradley, J., dissented; urging that the policy insured against loss of the hand, and that, it being shown that the entire use of the hand was lost, there might be a recovery. Upon the second hearing this view was taken; Warner and Ward, JJ., sustaining it; Lewis, J., dissenting; and Bradley, J., not voting; and this order was afterwards affirmed by the court of appeals in 156 N. Y. 669, 50 N. E. 1122. Again, in Lord v. American Mut. Acci. Assn. 61 N. W. 293, 26 L. R. A. 741, the supreme court of Wisconsin held that "it is for the jury to determine whether a total loss of three fingers and a part of another on the same hand, destruction of the joint of the thumb, and a cutting of the hand, is a loss of the hand, 'causing immediate, continuous, and total disability,' within the meaning of that clause in a policy of accident insurance." 89 Wis. 19, 26 L. R. A. 741. A number of cases are collected in a note to Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Mich.) 38 L. R. A. 535, 536. In 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 301, this subject is summed up as follows: "It has been contended on behalf of the insurance companies that the provisions in regard to the 'loss' of the hands and feet must be understood to imply an actual amputation or physical severance of those members from the body. But this view has not met with favor from the courts; it being held that, to entitle the insured to recover, physical severance is unnecessary, but it is sufficient if he has been deprived entirely of the use of the feet and hands as members of the body. And there can scarcely be any doubt as to the soundness of this view, for if the feet and hands cannot be used for the purpose of moving about or walking, or for holding and handling things, they are in fact lost as much as though actually severed from the body. Many of the companies have altered their policies so as to read, 'the loss of feet or hands by severance' thereof; but this provision has been held to be intended to refer to the manner rather than to the exact physical intent of the injury." These cases establish the proposition that where an insurance policy insures against the loss of a member, or a loss of an entire member, the word "loss" should be construed to mean the destruction of the usefulness of the member, or the entire member, for the purposes to which, in its normal condition, it was susceptible of application. In all of these policies the word "loss" is used, and it is the loss of the member that is in terms insured against. As indicated in the last authority cited, the attempts of the insurance companies to avoid this construction by so changing the policy that it reads, "Loss by severance of feet or hands," has failed; the courts holding, as before, that it is the loss of the use of the member which was the object of the contract. In the present case the word "loss" is eliminated, and the insurance is against "an injury that shall cause the amputation of a limb (whole hand or foot), or total and permanent loss of eyesight." This language is not ambiguous, and, if the insurance company intended to limit its liability to cases where the entire member was actually amputated, they could not well have chosen more apt and certain language to indicate it, without supplementing it with a negative statement that should exclude recovery for the amputation of less than the entire foot or hand; and it is doubtful if that would not be open to the same construction as the language actually used. This company is comprised of the insured. They make contracts of insurance which protect against certain injuries merely. It is not for us to make contracts for them, nor should we enlarge their liabilities. We may determine the intention of the contracting parties as disclosed by the contract if it is ambiguous, or in the light of the circumstances under which it is made, if it is fairly susceptible of a different meaning from that naturally implied by the unexplained use of the words. This is neither.

The instruction of the learned circuit judge was correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

STATE of Minnesota, Resp't.,
v.

George A. ZENO, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. It is competent for the legislature of this state, in the interests of the public health and welfare, to enact laws for the purpose of regulating and throwing restrictions around the occupation or calling of barbers.
2. Gen. Laws 1897, chap. 186, in so far as it prohibits any person from following the occupation of a barber in this state without first obtaining a certificate of registration as therein required, is valid, and not in violation of the Constitution.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Municipal Court of Minneapolis denying a new trial after conviction for violating the statute against following the occupation of barber without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Albert H. Hall and C. J. Cahaley, for appellant:

The act under which defendant was tried and convicted is vicious in the extreme, since its evident purpose is the legalizing of a trade union or trust; and its offensive paternalism is in clear contravention of constitutional limitations.

Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 115, 50 Am. Rep. 636. The act cannot be justified as an exercise of police power.

The law will not allow the right of property to be invaded under the guise of a police regulation for the promotion of health when it is manifest that is not the object and purpose of the regulation.

The act is unconstitutional, since it deprives defendant of life, liberty, and property without due process of law.

Mr. L. A. Reed for respondent.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was convicted in the municipal court of the city of Minneapolis of a violation of chapter 186, Gen. Laws 1897, and appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Defendant is a barber, and has followed that occupation since 1880,—most of the time in this state. At the time of the violation of the law in question he was located and engaged in such calling at the city of Minneapolis. On the 1st day of April, 1899, he performed certain acts within his calling upon the persons of John Madden and Rudolph Schall, without first having obtained a license as required by such law; and for this he was convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine. There is no controversy about the facts. Defendant violated the law by continuing in his occupation without a license, and was properly convicted, unless it be held that the law is unconstitutional and void. The sections of the law applicable to this case are as follows:

"Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful for any person to follow the occupation of barber in this state unless he shall have first obtained a certificate of registration as provided in this act; provided, however, that nothing in this act contained shall apply to or affect any person who is now actually engaged in such occupation, except as hereinafter provided."

Sections 2 et seq. provide for a board of examiners, and prescribe their duties. Section 7 provides that persons engaged in the occupation of barbers in this state at the time of the approval of the act shall be entitled to license certificates upon the payment of a fee of $1, and filing with the secretary of the board an affidavit of residence, etc.

"Sec. 8. Any person desiring to obtain a 48 L. R. A. certificate of registration under this act shall make application to said board therefor, and shall pay to the treasurer of said board an examination fee of $5, and shall present himself at the next regular meeting of the board for examination of applicants, whereupon said board shall proceed to examine such person, and being satisfied that he is above the age of nineteen (19) years, of good moral character, free from contagious or infectious diseases, has either (a) studied the trade for three (3) years as an apprentice under a qualified and practising barber, or (b) studied the trade for at least three (3) years in a properly appointed and conducted barber school under the instructions of a competent barber, or (c) practised the trade in another state for at least three (3) years, and is possessed of the requisite skill in said trade to properly perform all the duties thereof, including his ability in the preparation of the tools, shaving, hair-cutting, and all the duties and services incident thereto, and is possessed of sufficient knowledge concerning the common diseases of the face and skin to avoid the aggravation and spreading thereof in the practice of said trade; his name shall be entered by the board in the register hereafter provided for, and a certificate of registration shall be issued to him.

"Sec. 14. Any person practising the occupation of a barber without having obtained a certificate of registration, as provided by this act, . . . is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine," etc.

The question as to the constitutionality of this statute is the only one involved in the case. Counsel for defendant assails the statute from all directions, and urge its invalidity on several grounds, but we need consider the points made by them only so far as they are pertinent to the statute as applied to this particular case. We will not stop to inquire whether it would be within the power of the legislature to limit the number of apprentices a barber should be permitted to have at one and the same time. Such question has no bearing upon the one now before us. It will be time enough to consider and determine it when it is presented in some case where that particular violation is complained of. The question in this case is, Is it competent for the legislature to prohibit persons from practising the calling of a barber without first obtaining a license or certificate of registration? Laws enacted for the purpose of regulating or throwing restrictions around a trade, calling, or occupation, in the interests of the public health and morals, are everywhere upheld and sustained. Such laws are within the police power of the state, and are universally sustained where enacted in the interests of the public welfare. The question presented in cases where the validity of such laws is called in question is no longer the power or authority of the legislature to enact them, but whether the occupation, calling, or business sought to be regulated is one involving the public health and interests. A person engaged in such an occupation is not alone interested therein. The public served by him is also interested. He is interested to the extent that it provides and furnishes him with employment and a means of livelihood. The public is interested in his competency and qualifications, and it is eminently proper that there be thrown around the calling protection from intrusion by incompetents, and others inimical to the public good. It is unnecessary to discuss the grounds upon which such laws are upheld, or the objections urged against them. Counsel for defendant ably present their side of the question, but the authorities are all against them. We cite, as pertinent to the question, State ex rel. Powell v. State Medical Examining Bd. 32 Minn. 327, 50 Am. Rep. 575, 20 N. W. 238; State ex rel. Chapman v. State Bd. of Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387, 26 N. W. 123; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; People ex rel. Nechamcus v. Warden of City Prison, 144 N. Y. 529, 27 L. R. A. 718, 39 N. E. 686; Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L. R. A. 551, 19 Atl. 1044; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 121, 32 L. ed. 625, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231.

Is the occupation of a barber a calling or trade involving to any degree the public health and public good? If it is, the law must be sustained. We hold that it is, and that the health of the citizen, and protection from diseases spread from barber shops conducted by unclean and incompetent barbers, fully justify the law. It is a fact of which we must take notice that the people of to-day come in contact with, and engage the services of, those following the occupation of barber, as much as, if not more than, any other occupation or profession. We must take notice of the fact, too, that the interests of the public health require and demand that persons following that occupation be reasonably familiar with, and favorably inclined towards, ordinary rules of cleanliness; that diseases of the face and skin are spread from barber shops, caused, no doubt, by uncleanness or the incompetency of barbers. We must take notice of the fact that to attain proficiency and competency as a barber requires training, study, and experience,—training in the art, and study and experience in the management and conduct of the calling. A design and purpose to protect the public from injurious results likely to follow from such conditions is the foundation of statutes like this. And, as we must take judicial notice of the foregoing facts, the foundation for this law is apparent. And it may be said, further, that there is as much reason for a law of this kind as to barbers as there is for such a law as to dentists, pharmacists, lawyers, and plumbers. It is enacted in the interests of the public health and welfare, and we sustain it.

The contention of appellant that if the law is sustained he will be unable to continue in his business, because he cannot now obtain a license, is not sound. He was a barber engaged in the occupation at the time of the approval of the law, but he failed to make application for a license under the terms of § 7, above quoted, within ninety days, or at all; and his contention is that, because he does not come within either of the three classes of applicants specified in § 8, he cannot obtain a license at all. This statute, like all statutes enacted in the interests of the public welfare, is entitled to a broad and liberal construction, and one that will give force and effect to the intention of the law-making power. Applying such a construction, we hold that a person who has followed the occupation of a barber for three years in this state, and is otherwise possessed of the necessary qualifications, is entitled to a certificate of registration, the same as a person coming into the state from another state. There was no intention to discriminate against barbers of this state and in favor of those residing in other states, and a construction of the law which would result in such discrimination cannot be permitted.

This disposes of all questions deserving special mention.

Order affirmed.

*A complaint which alleges that the plaintiff, a dealer in farm produce, had a profitable business, that the defendants had conspired together to refuse to deal with him and to induce others to do likewise, it not appearing that their interference with his business was to serve any legitimate interests of their own, but that it was done maliciously, to injure him, and that the conspiracy had been carried into execution, whereby his business was ruined, states a cause of action.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants interposed a general demurrer.

The demurrer to the complaint in this case, and they appealed from the order of the district court of the county of Hennepin overruling their demurrer. The material facts alleged in the complaint are these: The plaintiff is now, and for two and a half years past has been, engaged, at the city of Minneapolis, in the business of a commission merchant, buying and selling farm produce and commodities. His profits from his business, prior to the committing of the wrongs hereinafter stated by the defendants, were $20,000 per year. To enable him to conduct his business, it has been and is necessary for him to buy such farm produce and commodities in the market at Minneapolis, and resell the same to his customers. The defendants, during the time the plaintiff has so conducted his business, have been, and still are, engaged in buying and selling farm produce and commodities, and they are practically all the persons, firms, and corporations who are engaged in such business in the city of Minneapolis, and during such time they have and still do control, regulate, and govern the quantity and price of such farm produce and commodities, and the purchase and sale thereof. The plaintiff, prior to July 19, 1899, was accustomed to and did purchase the produce and commodities so dealt in by him from the defendants, and paid them therefor in full. But on the day named, and at various subsequent times, the defendant the produce exchange conspired, confederated, and agreed to and with all of the other defendants herein not to sell to, or buy of, plaintiff, in any manner, any farm produce or commodities for the purpose of carrying on his business. The defendant the produce exchange then and there did maliciously solicit and procure from all of its codefendants, and each of them, and from many other persons to the plaintiff unknown, an agreement not to sell to, or buy from, plaintiff such products and commodities, and did so induce its codefendants, and each of them, and other persons, by the aid of, and through the influence of, all of the defendants, not to sell to, or buy of, the plaintiff any of such products and commodities, for the purpose of his business or otherwise. In pursuance of such conspiracy, each and all of the defendants have, with such malicious and unlawful intent, ever since July 19, 1899, refused so to sell to, or buy of, the plaintiff, and have daily circulated among and reported to the patrons of the plaintiff that he was unable to buy, such products and commodities, with the intent of inducing such patrons to discontinue doing business with the plaintiff. The business of the plaintiff, by reason of the premises, has been ruined, and he has been damaged thereby in the sum of $25,000.

If the allegations of the complaint are true, and the demurrer admits them, it is certain that the plaintiff has suffered material financial injury by the acts of the defendant. Does the law afford him any remedy? Counsel for the defendants insist that the question must be answered in the negative, because their acts in the premises were lawful, and, being so, the intent with which they did the acts is immaterial. It may be conceded that, if the acts of the defendants were lawful, the motive which actuated them is immaterial in determining the strict legal rights of the parties. The question, then, is, Were the defendants' acts legal? In its broadest aspect, this question involves considerations of the highest importance to the individual and to the public. The genius of our free institutions encourages all men to seek better fortunes, higher levels, and larger opportunities for success in life. Therefore, within proper limits, it is both lawful and commendable for men to combine for the purpose of securing better wages or larger returns from their business ventures. It is not, however, our purpose to enter upon any general discussion as to the limitations upon this right of men to combine for the purpose of furthering their own interests, without reference to the rights of others. Our sole purpose is to inquire whether the acts of the defendants in this case were, as to the plaintiff, lawful. The defendants rely upon the case of Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, sub nom. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Northwestern Lumbermen's Asso. 21 L. R. A. 337, 55 N. W. 1119, in support of their contention that the defendants' acts in question were lawful. The general propositions of law laid down in the decision in that case are sound, as applied to the facts of that particular case, which were substantially these: The defendants were retail lumber dealers, and formed a voluntary association, by which they mutually agreed that they would not deal with any wholesale dealer who should sell lumber to persons not dealers at the place where a member of the association was carrying on business. The object of the association was to protect its members against sales by wholesale dealers to contractors and consumers. In case a wholesale dealer made any such sale, and refused to make amends therefor, as provided by the by-laws of the association, its secretary was required to notify all of its members of the fact, and thereafter such members were to refrain from dealing with the offending wholesale dealer. The plaintiff, the Bohn Manufacturing Company, a wholesale dealer, having made such a sale, the secretary of the association was about to send notice of the fact to all of its members. Thereupon the company commenced an action for a permanent injunction, enjoining the defendants from issuing such notices. This court held that the action would not lie. The decision was correct, but it is not applicable to the alleged facts in this case. It is to be noted that the defendants in the Bohn Case had similar legitimate interests to protect, which were menaced by the practice of wholesale dealers in selling lumber to contractors and consumers, and that the defendants' efforts to induce parties not to deal with offending wholesale dealers were limited to the members of the association having similar interests to conserve, and that there was no agreement or combination or attempt to induce other persons not members of 48 L. R. A.

the association to withhold their patronage from such wholesale dealer. In this respect the case differs essentially from the one at bar, in which the complaint does not show that the defendants had any legitimate interests to protect by their alleged combination. On the contrary, it is expressly alleged in the complaint that the combination, which was carried into execution, was for the sole purpose of injuring the plaintiff's business, and that the defendants conspired to induce the plaintiff's patrons and persons, other than the defendants, to refuse to deal with him. Such alleged acts on the part of the defendants are clearly unlawful.

It is true, as claimed by the defendants and as stated in the Bohn Case, that a man, not under contract obligations to the contrary, has a right to refuse to work for, or deal with, any man or class of men, as he sees fit, and that the right which one man may exercise singly many may lawfully agree by voluntary association to do jointly, provided they do not interfere with the legal rights of others. But one man singly, nor any number of men jointly, having no legitimate interests to protect, may not lawfully ruin the business of another by maliciously inducing his patrons and third parties not to deal with him. See Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 562; Dels v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, 16 S. W. 111; Graham v. St. Charles Street R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 214, 27 L. R. A. 416, 16 So. 806; Hopkins v. Osley Stave Co. 49 U. S. App. 709, 83 Fed. Rep. 912, 28 C. C. A. 99.

This is just what the complaint in this case charges the defendants with doing, and we hold that it states a cause of action.

Order affirmed.

STATE of Minnesota, Respt.,
v.

Lyman E. COWDERY, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. A provision in a storage receipt, issued under § 7046, Gen. Stat. 1894, that the stored property may be mingled with other property of the same kind, or transferred to other elevators or warehouses, does not confer authority on the warehouseman to sell the property described therein.
2. Under such a receipt, when it in other respects conforms to the provisions of § 7046, Gen. Stat. 1894, the contract is a bailment, and not a sale.
3. Flax is included within the meaning and intent of §§ 7045 et seq., Gen. Stat. 1894, and is subject to the protection of the warehouse law.
4. The evidence in this case does not show beyond a reasonable doubt that there was an intent to defraud the prosecutor, which is an essential ingredient of the offense charged, and the conviction is therefore set aside.

APPPEAL by defendant Cowdery from a judgment of the District Court for Dodge County convicting him of larceny in fraudulently misappropriating flax which had been delivered to him for storage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Childs, Edgerton, & Wickwire for appellant.

Messrs. W. B. Douglas, Attorney General, and C. W. Somerby, for respondent:

The tickets issued to complaining witness by the firm of Cowdery & Wheeler were contracts of bailment.

State v. Barry (Minn.) 79 N. W. 656; Nichall v. Paige, 10 Gray, 368; 3 Jones, Bailm. 56.

Wherever a criminal intent can be shown along with the other essentials of the offense, a prosecution under the Penal Code for larceny will lie.

The jury found from all the circumstances the essential criminal intent.

All that is necessary on this question of intent is that the intention to appropriate another's property to one's own use be present at the time of the taking, and it is sufficient if the intention be to appropriate such property for the time being; and a mental reservation or hope entertained, to be able in the future to make restitution, does not relieve the act of its criminal character.

The indictment was sufficient.

Mr. J. J. McCaughey also for respondent.

Lovely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant, who was jointly indicted with another person, was convicted of the crime of larceny, as bailee, in fraudulently appropriating a quantity of flax to his own use, with intent, as charged in the indictment, "to deprive the owner thereof of his property," under the provisions of subdivision 2, § 6709, Gen. Stat. 1894. Lyman E. Cowdery was a warehouseman, and, with his partner, was running an elevator at Kasson, where he received, from time to time, quantities of flax from the prosecuting witness, Bradshaw, aggregating in amount 760 bushels, and evidenced by nine receipts or tickets, which were given to the owner of the flax, and which the prosecution insist constituted the relation of bailor and bailee between the parties thereto, under the warehouse laws of this state. Sections 7645 et seq., Gen. Stat. 1894. The warehousemen became insolvent, made an assignment, and were unable either to furnish the flax or put up the equivalent in money. The defendant insists that the tickets or storage receipts did not create the relation of bailment between defendant (who was tried alone) and the owner of the flax, but by the terms of such receipts constituted a sale thereof to the defendant and his partner, or, at least, authority to part with the flax; that the warehouse law, under which such contract of bailment must be established, does not apply to flax; also that, by reason of the previous business relations and conduct of the owner of the property stored with the defendant, the latter was led to believe that he was authorized to deal with the flax without reference to the terms of the receipts; from which, as defendant claims, it follows that there was no proof of the necessary intent to defraud, which as alleged in the indictment is an essential element of the statute, and must therefore be proved. The warehouse receipts referred to contain the requisites of § 7646, Gen. Stat. 1894, in all respects. They, "in clear terms state the amount, kind, and grade of the grain stored, the terms of storage," and, in addition, the following provision, which embraces the pith of the contention upon the construction of the storage receipt, viz.: "Express authority is given, by acceptance hereof, that said grain or seed may be mingled with grain or seed of other persons, and shipped or removed to any other elevator we may select." And it is urged that these provisions, which authorize a removal of the flax, etc., take this case out of the provisions of the Penal Code.

It is urged, in support of this claim, that an interpretation of the warehouse statutes should be made that does not conflict with the generally settled rules of the common law, and that the particular provision of these contracts quoted above is inconsistent with the theory of a bailment. While it is unquestionably true that the commingling of the property of one person with the property of another, with the consent of the owners, so as to destroy the specific identity of each, conclusively negatives the relation of bailor and bailee upon common-law rules, it must be remembered that it was the object of the statute to provide a remedy for the protection of the agricultural producers of this state which they did not have before, and, if the purpose and practical means by which such protection is afforded is to be found clearly expressed in the statute, it necessarily must be the statute, instead of the common law, that we are to interpret. It is our duty to discover the true legislative intent expressed by the statute, for, within constitutional limitations, that is always the real test in such cases. We cannot allow a repeal or modification of a statute by the law which the statute itself seeks to change; this is self-evident. Neither can we abridge the effectiveness of a wholesome statute by judicial construction or finesse. The very nature of the business that has long been conducted in this state by the owners of elevators and warehouses in dealing with the agricultural producers would lead to the inference that the provisions of the statute referred to were intended to create on the part of the warehousemen an obligation to have the owner's property or its equivalent ready for delivery when called for. The receipt, according to the statute, must be in writing, and it must state amount and grade of grain, charges for storage, and advances paid, which receipt shall be prima facie evidence that the holder thereof has in store with the party issuing such receipt the amount of grain, of the kind and grade mentioned in such receipt, and penal provisions follow against false statements, etc. The suggestion arises, Why should this contract be in writing? Why so explicit? and Why, upon its face, should evidence of its present money value be required, unless it was intended to be evidence of title and to become negotiable? And it follows that, if the title of the property is to remain in the owner, by necessary implication, that the contract, while not a common-law bailment, becomes vested with the characteristics of that trust relation, and is a bailment under the statute. We do not think that the acts of mingling produce of one person with that of another, or the removal of such property from one elevator to another, are in necessary conflict with this view. These acts are essential in the conduct of the elevator and warehouse business. It must be mingled with other produce, if it is taken in store, or there would have to be a warehouse for every patron; and, in facilitating the business in question, it likewise may be necessary to remove the property stored from one depository to another, to accomplish practical ends. The earnestness of the able counsel for defendant in presenting their views upon this point has led to this consideration of this view, rather than any serious doubt upon the question itself; for we think the contention now urged has been anticipated and specifically provided against by the warehouse law itself. Section 7645, Gen. Stat. 1894,—the preceding section to the one last referred to,—provides, inter alia, "that whenever any grain shall be delivered for storage to any person . . . such delivery shall in all things be deemed and treated as a bailment, and not as a sale, of the property so delivered, notwithstanding such grain may be mingled by such bailee with the grain of other persons, and notwithstanding such grain may be shipped or removed from the warehouse, elevator, or other place where the same was stored," etc. While this language remains in the statute, it is difficult to see how there can be room for interpretation, for the language of the receipts in this case is almost identical with the provisions which the statute declares shall not affect the liability of the warehouseman as bailee, and that this court has so understood its effect is clear from its decision in State v. Barry (Minn.) 79 N. W. 556. Upon the receipts themselves we think it is clear that defendant was a bailee, and amenable to the law under which he was indicted.

Again, it is urged for defendant that the warehouse acts do not provide for storage of flax, which is not included in any proper definition of the word "grain." The distinctive word of the statute is "grain," and "flax" is not specifically referred to by that name, and it, of course, becomes a question whether the storage of flax was within the 48 L. R. A. legislative intent when these acts were passed. An imposing array of dictionaries and encyclopedias were produced on the argument to show that grain is a berry and flax a fiber. But this is a question of reasonable construction of a statute, rather than a scientific analysis, which must yield to the popular understanding that ought to prevail in such cases. Courts appeal to dictionaries in questions of doubt in science, and perhaps in search of evidence of popular understanding, when in doubt. But where, within the knowledge of the court, the dictionary conflicts with popular understanding, the latter will be adopted, although it may require a subsequent enlargement of the definitions of the lexicographer, which is continually necessary, since the dictionary is an evidence, rather than an originator, of definitions. We have no doubt whatever from the custom at the time these statutes were enacted that they were supposed to apply to flax. It would startle the legislature that enacted them, or the legislatures that have convened since without recognizing the necessity of amending them, as well as the farmers of this state, who have continuously, since the law was passed, accepted receipts for deposits of flax, to tell them that in that respect it was not the intention of the law-makers to protect them as well as the growers of wheat and barley. We think it would likewise startle the warehousemen themselves to construe such a distinction into the law. The defendant evidently saw no difference at the time of the issuance of his receipts to Bradshaw, for the words "grain" and "flax" are used convertibly in such receipts, and we judge from the record that his able counsel did not urge this view during the trial, or until after their briefs in this court had been printed. While in criminal cases, under the harsh penal statutes that once governed in England, nice and technical constructions upon indictments and statutes were adopted in favorem vitæ, a more liberal rule has since prevailed, more consistent with common sense, and we shall adopt in this case the construction which protects the numerous bailors of flax in this state, which we have no doubt was within the legislative, as well as the popular, mind when these laws were enacted.

The remaining assignments of error, with the exception of one, relate to alleged errors that are not likely to occur again, and, in view of the disposition we shall make of this case, need not be considered.

The evidence of defendant's intent to defraud in this record is solely the presumption arising from his inability to turn over to the prosecutor the flax stored upon demand, and it seems doubtful if the complaining witness intended a criminal prosecution until many months afterwards, when such demand, which seems to have been merely formal, without expectation that it would be complied with, was made. It is true that this proof of demand and refusal raises a presumption of guilt, and makes a prima facie case against defendant, but this presumption is so overcome by opposite inferences, from admitted and undisputed facts, that we cannot permit the verdict to rest upon it alone. We do not find in this record any of the indicia of crime usual in similar prosecutions. The defendant had made no preparations for business collapse. He had run his affairs in the usual way, which had grown up, under the sanction of prosecutor and his other patrons, for many years, until, on a declining market, he found himself short, and unable to meet all his obligations. That defendant was a man of irreproachable character was established at the trial by a formidable number of witnesses, some of whom had stored produce with him, and had suffered loss, under the same circumstances as the complaining witness. Previous to the suspension of defendant's business, he and the prosecutor had conducted their business relations upon terms of unlimited confidence, for many years. The latter had stored his produce with defendant, sometimes receiving receipts and sometimes not. In all such cases it seems that such deposits were treated by defendant as if he had authority to dispose of them according to his best judgment, with the sanction of the prosecutor. These and other facts disclosed by the record lead us to the conclusion that this verdict should not be allowed to stand. Our views in this respect are strengthened by a statement of the learned trial court, which expressed doubts of the justness of the result.

It is ordered that the judgment of the court below be set aside, and a new trial awarded.

(.....Miss.....)

1. A trespassing dog cannot lawfully be killed merely because the owner has been notified to keep the dog off the premises.
2. The reasonable necessity for killing a trespassing dog is a question for the jury under all the facts and circumstances of the case.
3. The value of a dog which has no market value may be shown by proving the pedigree, characteristics, and qualities of the dog, and then proving by witnesses who know these things their opinions as to the value.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sunflower County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the killing of a dog. Reversed.

The defense was that the dog was trespassing, and that the killing was done to prevent it from damaging corn and cotton in the field through which it was running, and that plaintiff had been notified to keep the dog off defendant's premises.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Wessrs. W. S. Chapman and W. R. Chapman for appellant.

Wessrs. Frank Johnston and Thomas R. Baird for appellee.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It may be that "property in dogs is of an imperfect or qualified nature," as held in Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693; Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161, 17 Am. Rep. 31; Wilton v. Weston, 48 Conn. 325; and Carthage v. Rhodes, 101 Mo. 175, 9 L. R. A. 352, 14 S. W. 181. And it is doubtless true that much of the conflict of decision touching this subject is due to the varying statutes of different states as regards their being the subject of larceny, etc. But it is very correctly said in the learned note to Hamby v. Samson (Iowa) 67 Am. St. Rep. at page 297, that "in the United States there has been a quite noticeable tendency in legislation and judicial decisions to recognize a complete property in dogs." When the right to kill a trespassing dog is in question, doubtless the difference in nature and instincts between the dog and ordinary domestic animals, as the horse or cow, may properly enter into its solution. It is said in the exhaustive note to this same case of Hamby v. Samson (Iowa) 40 L. R. A. at page 510, that "it is generally held that a merely trespassing dog cannot be killed," and the authorities pro and con are cited. In that note, and also in the note to Tonawanda R. Co. v. Munger, 49 Am. Dec., at page 260, illustrations are given of the conditions under which it would be lawful to kill a trespassing dog: Sheep-killing dogs may be killed; dogs destroying deer, fowls, or other animals, where necessary to their preservation; howling dogs on one's premises may be killed, etc. But it is said the dog must be killed at the time and not on account of past damage done by him. Id., and authorities. The true rule is thus stated in 67 Am. St. Rep., note, at pages 294, 295: "But one is never justified in going to excessive lengths in the defense of himself or his property from assault or injury. The method of defense adopted must bear a certain relation to the character or seriousness of the threatened injury. . . . The fact that a dog is trespassing does not justify his wanton or malicious destruction." And again: "In any case, the question as to whether the defendant was justified in killing or injuring plaintiff's dog should be submitted to the jury, to be decided from a consideration of the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case." The court virtually told the jury, in its modifications of plaintiff's instructions, that, "if they believed defendant had warned plaintiff not to let his dogs run in his field," defendant was not liable. This was error. Notice to keep his dogs out was one fact, but not the only fact, to be considered. Notice of that sort is not conclusive. See authorities collected in paragraph 3, 49 Am. Dec. 259. When it is borne in mind of what great value some dogs are, the reasonableness of the general rule against the right to kill a meretrespassing dog is apparent. See Mullaly v. People, supra, 86 N. Y. 365, and note, 40 L. R. A. p. 510. Here, at the time this English deerhound was killed, she was running through the corn rows in November, when the corn was thoroughly matured. She had done at that time no damage to the cotton. The defendant says he killed her to prevent her doing damage by knocking out cotton from the stalks. The jury should not have been told that notice was a perfect defense. All the circumstances in evidence were before them, and the reasonableness of the alleged necessity of killing the dog to save property should have been left to them, as a question of fact, under proper instructions as to the law.

The court also erred in its instruction as to the necessity of proving market value. The doctrine supported by reason and the authorities is that you may prove the market value if the dog has any, and, if not, then his "special or pecuniary value to his owner, that may be ascertained by reference to his usefulness and services." Heiligmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 222, 13 L. R. A. 275, 16 S. W. 932. And it is perfectly competent to prove the pedigree, characteristics, and qualities of the dog, and then prove, by witnesses who know these things, their opinions as to the value. Bowers v. Horen, 93 Mich. 420, 17 L. R. A. 773, 53 N. W. 535. And on both these propositions see, specially, the notes to Hamby v. Samson (Iowa) 67 Am. St. Rep. 292, 293, with the authorities, and the other in 40 L. R. A. 515, 518 (viii.), et seq.

Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for a new trial.

MT. TOM SULPHITE PULP COMPANY.

1. An employer need not warn an employee whose special business is to oil a shaft and bearing, of his introduction of a set screw to fasten a collar near the end of the shaft, although it projects in such a manner as to be likely to catch the clothing of persons coming near it.
2. Evidence that it is not customary in factories to have collars with projecting set screws placed on revolving shafts near pulleys, where it is necessary for employees to go frequently, is not admissible to show the duty of a particular employer towards his employees.

NOTE.—Right of a servant to recover for injuries caused by projecting screws in shafts and other moving machinery.

- I. Discussion of the question whether the maintenance of a set screw imports negligence at common law.
- II. Liability of master under statutes.
- III. Defenses of assumption of risks and contributory negligence.
- I. Discussion of the question whether the maintenance of a set screw imports negligence at common law.

The doctrine adopted by some courts is that a master is, as matter of law, not guilty of negligence in maintaining an uncovered shaft with a projecting screw, this doctrine being referred to the principle that it is a common contrivance preferable to any known device for the purpose which it is designed to serve. Hale v. Cheney (1893) 158 Mass. 268, 34 N. E. 255 (there plaintiff was only sixteen years of age, but no weight was attached to this fact); Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills (1888) 146 Mass. 261, 15 N. E. 576; Dillman v. Hamilton (1898) 14 Mont. Co. L. Rep. 92 (plaintiff was twenty years old); Lewis v. Simpson (1892) 3 Wash. 641, 29 Pac. 207.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Hampshire County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court, of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John B. O'Donnell, for plaintiff:

The principle by which the servant is presumed to assume the risks of the business should not be so extended as to impair in the least degree the obligation resting upon the master, in the prosecution of a business involving unusual risk of health, of life, or limb, to employ well-guarded instruments and competent agents.

Cayzer v. Taylor, 10 Gray, 274, 69 Am. Dec. 317.

Or, as the rule may also be stated, to leave gearings, set screws, and other parts of machinery unboxed is not negligence, where other manufacturers in the same line of business operate their machinery in the same manner. Wabash Paper Co. v. Webb (1896) 146 Ind. 303, 45 N. E. 474.

It follows, therefore, that although there may be a safer kind of set screw which is also in common use, the master owes the servant no duty to box the pulley or shaft, or to change the set screw for a safer one. Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. (1894) 161 Mass. 153, 159, 36 N. E. 368; Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills (1888) 146 Mass. 261, 15 N. E. 576.

But it has recently been held by one of the Federal courts of appeals that the doctrine that a master is not bound to abandon the use of a particular machine which is in common use because there are other better and safer machines to be had, cannot be successfully invoked for the purpose of excusing him for his failure to place a suitable guard around machinery which is of such a nature, or so located, as to be a constant menace to the safety of those who, in the discharge of their duties, are constantly compelled to pass in close proximity to it. In such a case the obligation to place a suitable guard around the machinery is

When the plaintiff entered the defendant's service he impliedly agreed to assume all the obvious risks of the business, including the risk of injury from the kind of machinery then openly used. This could not include working near such a set screw in the dark.

Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. 161 Mass. 153, 36 N. E. 789.

Any person who allows a dangerous place to exist on his premises is responsible for an injury caused thereby to any other person who enters on the premises by his invitation or procurement, in the use of due care and without notice of the danger.

Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506.

Assuming that the set screw was always there, in the dark and not seen or known by the plaintiff, the risk was not so obvious that the plaintiff must be taken to have assumed it.

Redmund v. Butler, 168 Mass. 367, 47 N. E. 108; Ciriack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733, 23 N. E. 829; Dolphin v. Plumley, 167 Mass. 167, 45 N. E. 87; McKee v. Tourtellotte, 167 Mass. 69, 44 N. E. 1071.

The set screw was not there when plaintiff made his contract, and he did not know of its existence. He therefore did not assume the risk.

Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. 161 Mass. 153, 36 N. E. 789.

If the set screw was there when the plaintiff was employed, he, being a laboring man, should have been informed of it and instructed; a fortiori if it was not there till long afterwards. In either case he should have been informed and instructed by the defendant.

De Costa v. Hargraves Mills, 170 Mass.

no less imperative than his duty to remedy a defect in the machine itself. Homestake Min. Co. v. Fullerton (1895) 36 U. S. App. 32, 69 Fed. Rep. 923, 16 C. C. A. 545.

This humane and reasonable doctrine, which embodies the principle laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, that conformity to the usage of other employers does not conclusively negative the existence of negligence (Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels (1882) 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 932), was enunciated in refusing to uphold the contention of defendant's counsel that an employee might be held to assume the risk of bolts protruding from a coupling of a revolving shaft, notwithstanding a promise of the foreman to cover it, on the ground that such promise was, not to repair an existing defect in the machinery, but to supply a new or additional appliance which the employer is under no obligation to furnish.

The liability of the master was held to be for the jury to decide, the evidence being that the servant's clothing was caught upon protruding bolts of a coupling of a rapidly revolving shaft located in a narrow and dark tunnel, near a cross timber under which such employee was obliged to stoop or crawl while passing through the tunnel in the discharge of his duties. Ibid.

In Minnesota, also, it has been held that the question as to a master's negligence is for the jury, in an action for injuries to a servant whose coat sleeve was caught by a set screw on a revolving shaft as he was attempting to place a belt upon a pulley 2 inches therefrom, where it appears that the head of the screw was not protected or guarded in any way, that it was a cube $\frac{1}{4}$ inch square and projected at least $\frac{5}{8}$ of an inch from the shaft, which was revolving about 150 times to the minute, and that it was frequently necessary to adjust the belt upon the pulley. Fruke v. South Park Foundry & Mach. Co. (1897) 68 Minn. 305, 71 N. W. 276.

But in another case the same court took the rather refined distinction that even if the defendant was negligent in having a shaft with a set screw projecting so far as to be dangerous to a servant whose work required him to be in close proximity to it, there could be no liability for an injury received by a servant who was oiling the machinery at some distance away, where the chances of his falling against the shaft were so slight and remote that they could not reasonably have been anticipated. Groff v. Duluth Imperial Mill Co. (1894) 58 Minn. 333, 59 N. W. 1049.

The present writer ventures to think that the reference to the test of reasonable anticipation is, under such circumstances, wholly unwarrantable. That the duty to provide a safe place of work inures in favor of all servants who are rightfully at the particular point where the dangerous conditions which are alleged to import culpability are found, seems to be a necessary corollary from the principles which define the position of a person invited on premises, as contrasted with the position of one who is a mere licensee or trespasser. The only ground, it is submitted, upon which a servant injured by uncovered machinery should be debarred from recovery is that his presence at the spot where the accident occurred amounted to positive contributory negligence, and that this is the single case in which a master should be allowed to excuse himself by the plea of non-anticipation.

In Galveston Oil Co. v. Thompson (1890) 76 Tex. 235, 13 S. W. 60, the court seems to have regarded a shaft with protruding screws as an appliance the maintenance of which imported negligence, but the specific ground of recovery was that the plaintiff had been negligently ordered to perform a service not within the scope of his employment.

Whether a master can be held liable for omitting to instruct a servant as to the position of a set screw depends upon whether the servant was inexperienced to such a degree that he could not reasonably be expected to understand the danger arising from it, and the master knew or ought to have known of that inexperience. Ingerman v. Moore (1891) 90 Cal. 410, 27 Pac. 306.

A machinist and engineer is chargeable with knowledge that set screws are in constant use in machinery, and cannot hold a master liable for an omission to apprise him of the danger caused by one on a shaft which he is repairing. Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills (1888) 146 Mass. 261, 15 N. E. 576; Keats v. National Heeling Mach. Co. (1895) 21 U. S. App. 656, 65 Fed. Rep. 940, 13 C. C. A. 221.

As to the duty of instruction, see, generally, note to James v. Rapides Lumber Co. (1898; La.) 44 L. R. A. 83.

II. Liability of master under statutes.

Under the Massachusetts employers' liability act of 1887 it is held that a set screw on a machine used for reeling wire does not of itself constitute a defect in the ways, works, or machinery, where it is not out of order, and is a common device for the purpose for which it is used. Donahue v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. (1897) 160 Mass. 574, 48 N. E. 842.

But under the similar Ontario act, known as the workmen's compensation for injuries act (Ont. Rev. Stat. 1887, chap. 141), the conclusion arrived at has been that a verdict of a jury based on the theory that a set screw is a defect is justifiable. O'Connor v. Hamilton Bridge Co. (1894) 25 Ont. Rep. 12, 21 Ont. App. Rep. 596, 24 Can. S. C. 598.

Whether a set screw is a breach of a statute expressly requiring the covering of machinery

375, 49 N. E. 735; La Fortune v. Jolly, 167 Mass. 170, 45 N. E. 83; Laplante v. Warren Cotton Mills, 165 Mass. 487, 43 N. E. 294; O'Connor v. Adams, 120 Mass. 427.

Messrs. Brooks & Hamilton, for defendant:

There was no evidence of any breach of duty by the defendant to the plaintiff.

Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. 161 Mass. 153, 36 N. E. 789; Connelly v. Hamilton Woollen Co. 163 Mass. 156, 39 N. E. 787; Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills, 146 Mass. 261, 15 N. E. 576; Carey v. Boston & M. R. Co. 168 Mass. 228, 33 N. E. 512; Donahue v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. 169 Mass. 574, 48 N. E. 842.

The evidence of custom in other factories was immaterial.

Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. 161 Mass. 161, 36 N. E. 789; Moynihan v. King's Windsor Cement Dry Mortar Co. 168 Mass. 450, 47 N. E. 425; Tenanty v. Boston Mfg. Co. 170 Mass. 323, 49 N. E. 654.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by one of the defendant's workmen, brought under the statute and at common law, for personal injuries caused seems to depend upon the terms in which it is expressed.

Thus, shafting and set screws in a factory, suspended 9 feet above the floor, are not within the provisions of N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 63, § 8, requiring them to be "properly guarded." Glassheim v. New York Economical Printing Co. (1895) 13 Misc. 174, 34 N. Y. Supp. 69.

On the other hand, the maintenance of unprotected spindles with a projecting set screw has in Canada been regarded as a breach of the factories act (Ont. Rev. Stat. 1887), chap. 208, § 15, subsec. 1, by which the requirement is that "moving machinery shall be fenced." O'Connor v. Hamilton Bridge Co. (1894) 25 Ont. Rep. 12, 21 Ont. App. Rep. 598, 24 Can. S. C. 598.

III. Defenses to assumption of risks and contributory negligence.

An experienced workman not shown to have been under full age or of less than average understanding assumes the risk of his glove catching on the set screw of a machine used for reeling wire, while reaching in his hand to get the wire for the purpose of taking the reel from the block. Donahue v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. (1897) 169 Mass. 574, 48 N. E. 842.

It is for the jury to say whether the risk of crossing a revolving shaft with two set screws projecting therefrom was appreciated by a servant who had no knowledge of machinery, and who was performing such duties that he had nothing to do with the operation of the shaft. Roth v. Northern P. Lumbering Co. (1889) 18 Or. 205, 22 Pac. 842.

It is not a conclusion of law from the fact that the plaintiff was aware of the existence of a set screw, and sprightly for one of his years, that he was aware of the risk of passing over the shaft while in motion. Dowling v. Allen (1881) 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298.

Whatever danger there is in the fact that a screw projects beyond the crank of a hand car, and that there is for this reason an increased probability that the clothes of a man turning the crank may be caught, is as well known and as obvious to one who has used the car for several days as it is to his employer. Carey v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1893) 158 Mass. 228, 33 N. E. 512.

by being caught by a set screw fastening a collar near the end of a revolving shaft. According to the evidence for the plaintiff, the set screw had been put in since the beginning of his employment, and, although he had charge of the machinery in the room, and oiled the shaft and bearing, he never had seen this screw. It seems not to have been disputed that there were other similar set screws in the place. The shaft referred to was about 13 feet from the floor, and at the time of the accident the plaintiff was on a platform 3 feet lower than the shaft, trying to throw a belt off a pulley at the end of it, on the other side of the bearing, and 1 foot distant from the set screw. There was not must light. The presiding judge took the case from the jury, and it is here on report.

We are of opinion that the ruling was right, and that the case cannot be distinguished satisfactorily from the numerous other cases in this commonwealth already decided concerning set screws. Donahue v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. 169 Mass. 574, 48 N. E. 842, and cases cited. This case shows that a few years ago a set screw was a common device. There is no evidence that it has ceased to be one. In Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills, 146 Mass. 261, 267, 15

An employee in a mill, who, acting within the scope of his duty, is ordered by the foreman to go up a ladder standing against a belt box into which a revolving shaft runs at right angles and nail a board on the box, in performing the service is injured by his apron and jacket catching on the shaft which is plainly visible and is seen by him, cannot recover from his employer. Russell v. Tillotson (1885) 140 Mass. 201, 4 N. E. 231.

A servant who drives a wagon along a particular way by the express direction of his master's representative, and is injured by the projecting bolts of a revolving shaft which, when it is too late, he finds himself unable to clear, while seated in the wagon, is not debarred from recovery by the rule that a servant must, at his peril, choose the safer of two alternative methods of doing his work. Such a direction is an implied statement that the way indicated is reasonably safe, and an instruction withdrawing the consideration of the direction from the jury is erroneous, when the question of the servant's exercise of due care is submitted to them. Hawkins v. Johnson (1886) 105 Ind. 29, 55 Am. Rep. 169, 4 N. E. 172.

The question as to contributory negligence of a servant injured by catching his coat sleeve upon a set screw upon a revolving shaft while he was attempting to adjust a belt upon a pulley on the shaft is for the jury, where it appears that he had often adjusted the pulley, and had never noticed the screw, and that other employees who had adjusted the belt in the same manner had not noticed it. Pruke v. South Park Foundry & Mach. Co. (1897) 68 Minn. 303, 71 N. W. 276.

In Dowling v. Allen (1881) 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298, it was held that it was for the jury to determine whether a boy of seventeen, who was working in a foundry, was negligent, where he was ordered to stop an engine and to hurry, this not being a part of his regular duties, and in executing the order his trousers were caught by an uncovered set screw and collar on a revolving shaft over which he stepped.

C. B. L.

N. E. 578,—a case very like the present,—it was said that “there was no danger which, in view of the plaintiff’s knowledge and capacity, must not have been well understood by and apparent to him, and there was, therefore, no negligence on the part of the defendant in exposing him to it.” See also Hale v. Cheney, 159 Mass. 268, 271, 272, 34 N. E. 255. In Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. 161 Mass. 153, 36 N. E. 789, it was held that an employer did not need to warn an adult workman of the presence and dangers of a set screw when employing him. As has been said or implied in other cases, where the danger is obviously great, as in the case of a revolving shaft, it is not necessary to give warning of elements which merely enhance the risk. Carey v. Boston & M. R. Co. 158 Mass. 228, 231, 33 N. E. 512. See also Keats v. National Heeling Mach. Co. 21 U. S. App. 656, 65 Fed. Rep. 940, 13 C. C. A. 221. The same considerations apply to the subsequent introduction of a set screw, when, as here, there is no pretense that the plaintiff remembered the alleged previous condition of the shaft, and was acting in reliance upon his former observation; and when, further, it was the plaintiff’s especial business to take charge of the machinery, and therefore to inform himself of its construction.

The question “whether or not it is customary in factories to have a collar with a projecting setscrew placed near a pulley where it is necessary for a person to go frequently to do something with reference to putting on a belt,” etc., was properly excluded. See Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. 161 Mass. 153, 161, 36 N. E. 789. The question in this highly specific form, supposing it to admit of an honest answer, must have been intended to furnish a pattern upon which the jury were to model the defendant’s duty, and it was at least within the discretion of the judge to exclude evidence directed to that point. It would have been admissible, no doubt, to show that set screws were going out of use, and no longer were to be expected or looked out for without special warning. But that was not what the evidence meant.

Judgment for defendant.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Hampshire
v.

Louis L. WELLS.

(.....N. H.....)

One who solicits orders for a firm having a permanent place of business in the state, without carrying any goods except those which have been previously ordered by his customers, or exposing any goods for sale, is not doing “business as a hawker or peddler,” nor “exposing for sale or selling” goods, within the meaning of Laws 1897, chap. 76, requiring a license from peddlers.

(March 17, 1899.)

PRESERVATION by the Belknap County Court for the opinion of the full bench of an indictment for selling goods without a license contrary to the provisions of the statute. Judgment for defendant.

Defendant resides in Laconia, and is employed to go from place to place within the county taking orders for certain kinds of groceries. The orders would be taken and filled from the employer’s store in Concord, and delivered by defendant in about a week from the time when taken. He neither carried nor exposed for sale any goods, but confined himself to taking orders and delivering the goods to fill them.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. F. M. Beckford, for the State:

Chapter 76 of the Laws of 1897 was intended to protect local dealers in their locality, and also the public against the fraud too often imposed upon the people by hawkers and peddlers.

Grafty v. Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 131, 8 N. E. 609; 3 Jacob, Law Dict. 1st Am. ed. 1811, p. 241; 10 Petersdorff, Abr. p. 206; 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 631; 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 306.

Going about taking orders constitutes a sale within the meaning of the law.

Grafty v. Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 131, 8 N. E. 609; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 307; State v. Ascher, 54 Conn. 299, 7 Atl. 822.

The question of where the goods were purchased by a hawker or peddler is of no consequence.

Laws 1897, chap. 46; State v. Powell (N. H.) 41 Atl. 171.

Mcassrs. Streeter, Walker, & Hollis, for defendant:

A peddler is one who carries about small commodities on his back or in a cart or wagon, and sells them.

Pegues v. Ray, 50 La. Ann. 574, 23 So. 904; Kennedy v. People use of LaJunta, 9 Colo. App. 490, 49 Pac. 373; Com. v. Farnum, 114 Mass. 270; Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493; Davenport v. Rice, 75 Iowa, 74, 39 N. W. 191.

Rea v. M'Knight, 10 Barn. & C. 734.

The fundamental idea contained in the definition of a peddler is that he is a person carrying his stock in trade with him in a pack or cart, and having the capacity to then and there close a bargain and consummate the sale by immediate delivery.

Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493; Grafty v. Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 128, 8 N. E. 609.

Wallace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment is for a violation of chapter 70, Laws 1897, entitled "An Act in Relation to Hawkers and Peddlers." Section 1 provides that "no person shall do any business as a hawker or peddler, or go about from town to town, or from place to place in the same town, exposing for sale or selling any goods, wares, or merchandise," except certain kinds of property therein named, without a license. It is apparent from the title of the act and from its terms that it was designed to affect hawkers and peddlers, and to regulate their business. The language used expresses the understanding of the legislature as to what acts constitute the business of a hawker or peddler. This definition is in accordance with the generally understood and accepted meaning of those terms.

The only question presented is whether the defendant, in doing what he did without a license, was guilty of a violation of the statute. "The leading primary idea of a hawker and peddler is that of an itinerant or traveling trader, who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them, to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader, who has goods for sale, and sells them, in a fixed place of business." Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493, 495. The defendant did not carry any goods about with him for sale; neither did he expose any for that purpose. He solicited orders for his employers, a firm having a permanent place of business in this state, and subsequently delivered the goods thus ordered. He made no sales on his own account. The sales were made by the firm through the defendant, as their agent. The defendant, in what he did, was not doing "business as a hawker or peddler," nor was he "exposing for sale or selling" goods, within the meaning of the statute. Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493; Com. v. Farnum, 114 Mass. 267; Davenport v. Rice, 75 Iowa, 74, 39 N. W. 191; Stuart v. Cunningham, 88 Iowa, 191, 20 L. R. A. 430, 55 N. W. 311; Rea v. M'Knight, 10 Barn. & C. 734. The acts of the defendant in taking the orders, and afterwards delivering the goods on those orders, for the company who employed him, were substantially the same as those of the employee of the ordinary retail grocery firm who takes orders and delivers goods. The only difference is that the grocer's clerk usually confines his operations to the town or city in which his firm is located, while the defendant extended his over a wider field. But no distinction can be made between the acts of the two on this ground, because the 48 L. R. A.

language of the statute makes it equally an offense for a person to go about "from place to place in the same town, exposing for sale or selling any goods," or for one to "go about from town to town" doing the same thing. It is plain that the legislature never intended to include the usual taking of orders and delivering of goods by the employee of a grocery store in the town where it is located within the prohibition of the statute, and to compel that class of persons to procure a license. Such a construction would defeat one of the most important objects of the statute,—the protection of local traders. When the only construction of the statute under which the defendant can be held leads to so absurd a result, it is evident the legislature never intended that acts like those of the defendant should be included within the operation of the statute.

Case discharged.

Kimball WEBSTER, Exr., etc., of James Ryan, Deceased,
v.

Mary SUGHROW et al.

1. A will creating a trust for the saying of masses may be upheld as a "charitable use," since the saying of mass in open church, where all who choose may be present and participate therein, is a solemn and impressive ritual, from which many may draw spiritual solace, guidance, and instruction, and the money expended therefor is of benefit to the clergy, thus accomplishing one of the cherished objects of religious uses.
2. A separate fund for the care of a burial lot and another for the saying of masses cannot be set aside by an executor under a will creating a trust "to pay the expense of keeping my burial lot in a proper and respectable condition and for having anniversary mass said annually," leaving it entirely to the executor's discretion to provide for the perpetuation of such services in any way he may deem proper, since the branches of the trust are to be administered together by the same trustee.

(July 29, 1898.)

PRESERVATION by the Supreme Court for Hillsboro County for the opinion of the full court of a bill for instructions as to the proper construction of a will. Case discharged.

The property was given in trust, first to pay funeral expenses; "the remainder to be held by said executor at his sole discretion, the income of which, and, if necessary, the principal, to pay the expense of keeping my burial lot in a proper and respectable condition, and for having anniversary mass said annually from the date of my decease, for myself, my deceased wife, and for her deceased sister, Lizzie. And I hereby leave it entirely at the discretion of my said executor to provide in any way that he may deem proper for the continuation or perpetuation of said services, without any authority or interference of the probate court or any person whomsoever, either in regard to this, or to the first, section of this will." The executor sought instructions upon two questions: (1) Does this provision of the will create a charitable trust in the matter of annual masses? (2) If it does, can he exercise his discretion in setting apart two certain sums, —one for the fund for the burial lot, the other for the saying of masses,—and appoint trustees to carry into effect the provisions of the trust, and provide for securing perpetual succession thereof?

NOTE.—As to validity of bequest for masses, see Pestorazzi v. St. Joseph Roman Catholic Church (Ala.) 25 L. R. A. 360, and note; and Sherman v. Baker (R. I.) 40 L. R. A. 717, and note.

Mr. George B. French, for plaintiff:

The plaintiff entertains doubts as to whether this will create a religious or charitable trust in the matter of annual masses, so as to constitute an exception to the law against perpetuities.

The doctrine of superstitious uses does not prevail in this country, and perhaps a limited amount can be expended for present masses.

Exrs. p. 1118, 1055, note.

Mr. Jeremiah J. Doyle for defendants.

Pike, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The statute of 43 Eliz. chap. 4 (1601), was the culmination of all prior legislation concerning charities. Since its passage, those objects are considered charitable that are named therein, and many others that are "not named, and not within the strict letter of the statute, but which come within its spirit, equity, and analogy." 2 Perry, Tr. § 692. Although the general principles of charitable trusts have been repeatedly recognized in this state (Duke v. Fuller, 9 N. H. 538, 32 Am. Dec. 392; Chapin v. School Dist. No. Two, 35 N. H. 454; Second Cong. Soc. v. First Cong. Soc. 14 N. H. 315; Brown v. Concord, 33 N. H. 285; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Abbot v. Dublin, 38 N. H. 459; New Market v. Smart, 45 N. H. 87), it "has not been judicially determined" whether this statute has been adopted. But concerning this it is not important to inquire, since "courts of equity have an original and an inherent jurisdiction over charities, independent of the statute." 48 L. R. A.

Goodale v. Mooney, 60 N. H. 528, 533, 49 Am. Rep. 334, 335; Pub. Stat. chap. 205, § 1. A charity, "in the legal sense, may be . . . defined as a gift to be applied, consistently with existing law, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government. It is immaterial whether the purpose is called charitable in the gift itself, if it is so described as to show that it is charitable in its nature." Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 556. No question arises as to the testator's right to create a trust for the purpose of keeping the "burial lot in a proper and respectable condition." The state approves of the creation of such trusts, and provides a way for the appointment of trustees therefor whenever a vacancy exists. Pub. Stat. chap. 40, § 5; Id. chap. 51, § 8; Laws 1891, chap. 19, §§ 1, 2; Laws 1893, chap. 68, §§ 1, 2; Laws 1897, chap. 6, § 1. It is in relation to the creating of a trust for the saying of masses about which there is contention. "The doctrine of superstitious uses arising from the statute (1 Edw. VI., chap. 14) under which devises for procuring masses were held to be void, . . . has never obtained in the United States. In this country there is absolute religious equality, and no discrimination in law is made between different religious creeds or forms of worship." Hoeffer v. Clogon, 171 Ill. 462, 40 L. R. A. 730, 40 N. E. 527; U. S. Const. Amend. 1; Bill of Rights, art. 5; Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312, 329, 16 N. E. 305; Gass v. Wilhite, 2 Dana, 170, 26 Am. Dec. 446; Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 224, 26 Am. Rep. 61; McHugh v. McCole, 97 Wis. 160, 40 L. R. A. 724, 72 N. W. 631; Rhymer's Appeal, 93 Pa. 142, 39 Am. Rep. 736; Schouler, Petitioner, 134 Mass. 426. It remains to be considered whether the saying of masses can be upheld as a "charitable use." In Seda v. Huble, 75 Iowa, 429, 39 N. W. 685, a bequest in trust for the benefit of a Catholic church, with directions to "invest said money safely for the benefit of said church, and that services should be held in said church for his soul yearly," was held to be valid as a bequest to a charitable use. In Schouler, Petitioner, 134 Mass. 426, a bequest for "burial and funeral expenses, and the residue for charitable purposes, masses," etc., was held to be valid on the ground that "masses are religious ceremonials or observances of the church of which she [the testatrix] was a member, and come within the religious, pious uses which are upheld as public charities." In Rhymer's Appeal, 93 Pa. 142, 39 Am. Rep. 736, the testator, after certain legacies, bequeathed all the residue of his estate "to St. Mary's Catholic Church, to be expended in masses for the benefit and repose of" his soul; and it was held to be a religious use, but failed because of a statute of that state requiring all such bequests to be executed with due formality at least one calendar month before the decease of the testator. The court said: "The testator has clearly declared the use or purpose to which his bequest shall be applied. It is to be expended in masses for the benefit and repose of his soul. While this may not be regarded as a charitable use, within the accepted meaning of the word, it is certainly in every proper sense of the term . . . a religious use. In the denomination with which the testator appears to have been identified, the mass is regarded as a prominent part of the religious service and worship. According to the Roman Catholic system of faith, there exists an intermediate state of the soul, after death and before final judgment, during which guilt incurred during life and unatoned for must be expiated; and the temporary punishments to which the souls of the penitent are thus subjected may be mitigated or arrested through the efficacy of the mass as a propitiatory sacrifice. Hence the practice of offering masses for the departed. It cannot be doubted that in obeying the injunction of the testator, and offering masses for the benefit and repose of his soul, the officiating priest would be performing a religious service; and none the less so because intercession would be specially invoked in behalf of the testator alone. The service is just the same in kind whether it be designed to promote the spiritual welfare of one or many. Prayer for the conversion of a single impenitent is as purely a religious act as a petition for the salvation of thousands. The services intended to be performed in carrying out the trust created by the testator's will, as well as the objects designed to be attained, are all essentially religious in their character." In harmony with this last case is the recent decision of Hoeffer v. Clogan, 171 Ill. 462, 40 L. R. A. 730, 49 N. E. 527, where the testator left to the Holy Family Church, its successors and assigns, real estate in trust to sell and expend the proceeds in saying masses for the repose of his soul and the souls of his deceased wife, mother-in-law, and brother-in-law, and a legacy in trust to be expended in saying masses for the repose of the souls of his father, mother, and sister. The devise and legacy were held to be charitable, and were not allowed to fail by want of a competent trustee. It is said in the opinion that, "while the testator may have a belief that it will benefit his soul or the souls of others doing penance for their sins, it is also a benefit to all others who may attend or participate in it. An act of public worship would certainly not be deprived of that character because it was also a special memorial of some person, or because special prayers should be included in the services for particular persons. Memorial services are often held in churches, but they are not less acts of worship because of their memorial character. . . . The mere fact that the bequest was given with the intention of obtaining some benefit, or from some personal motive, does not rob it of its character as charitable." The saying of mass is a ceremonial celebrated by the priest in open church, where all who choose may be present and participate there- 48 L. R. A.

in. It is a solemn and impressive ritual, from which many draw spiritual solace, guidance, and instruction. It is religious in its form and in its teaching, and clearly comes within that class of trusts or uses denominated in law as charitable. And, while the effect of these services upon the members of this church is impressive and beneficial, the money expended for the celebrations thereof is of benefit to the clergy, and is upheld and maintained for this reason, as one of the cherished objects of religious uses. Atty. Gen. ex rel. Abbot v. Dublin, 38 N. H. 459; Hoeffer v. Clogan, 171 Ill. 462, 40 L. R. A. 730, 49 N. E. 527. The upholding of such trusts is in harmony with the principles of our law.

2. The executor is not empowered to set apart one sum for the care of the burial lot, and another for the saying of masses. The branches of the trust are to be administered together, and by the same trustee. The discretion with which the executor is invested extends only to the methods to be adopted in the performance of this duty. The whole trust is to be administered by him (Brock v. Sawyer, 39 N. H. 547), or by someone else appointed in his place by the probate court. Pub. Stat. chap. 198, § 6.

STATE of New Hampshire
v.

Michael KEAN.

(.....N. H.)

An indictable nuisance is created by a bay window which extends 4 feet and 7 inches over a street, at a point 8 feet above the ground, although it does not interfere with travel on the highway, where the statute declares that a building, structure, or fence shall be deemed a public nuisance if "erected or continued upon or over any highway so as to obstruct the same or lessen the full breadth thereof."

(March 12, 1897.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Court for Hillsboro County for the opinion of the full court of an indictment charging defendant with erecting a nuisance consisting of a bay window in a public highway. Judgment against defendant.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

For provision in deed limiting projection of bay window, see Atty. Gen. v. Algonquin Club (Mass.) 11 L. R. A. 500.

For municipal power over buildings as nuisances in street, see note to Hagerstown v. Witmer (Md.) 39 L. R. A., beginning on page 662.

Mr. James P. Tuttle, for the State:

When this bay window was projected over the street and into the street 4 feet 7 inches, the condition of that street was changed.

The ruling in the present case is correct. Hopkins v. Crombie, 4 N. H. 524.

When land is taken for public use as a highway, the landowner is entitled to receive a sum in damages, which in theory of law is an indemnity for the use of the land taken.

Mr. Oliver E. Branch, for defendant:

It is not an indictable offense, to which there is no defense, to erect a building, structure, or fence of any kind upon or over a highway.

The rights of the public in a highway are in the nature of an easement or right of passage, and the soil and freehold belong to the owners of the land.

Whether an obstruction of a highway constitutes a nuisance is a question of fact for the jury.

Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257, 69 Am. Dec. 536; State v. Hall, 22 N. H. 384.

On petition for rehearing.

In the decision the court did not consider that the defendant, being under an indictment, is entitled to a jury trial on all the facts alleged and not admitted.

N. H. Const. pt. 1, art. 15.

The court did not consider that the offense for which the respondent was indicted is by statute made a public nuisance (Pub. Stat. chap. 77, § 8), and, being a public nuisance, the respondent has a constitutional right to a trial by jury.

State ex rel. Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 18 L. R. A. 646, 25 Atl. 588.

The court in the decision did not consider that upon the trial of the indictment the respondent would have been entitled, if no facts had been admitted, to instructions to the jury upon the following questions:

(1) Is the bay window erected upon or over the highway? (2) If it is so erected, does it obstruct the same? (3) If it is so erected, does it lessen the full breadth of the highway?

A purpresture is not necessarily a public nuisance. A public nuisance must be something which subjects the public to some degree of inconvenience or annoyance; but a purpresture may exist without putting the public to any inconvenience whatever. Sections 1-6 inclusive, chap. 77, Pub. Stat., cover cases of "actual obstruction," and furnish a remedy for their prompt and immediate removal. But they must not be confounded with the subject-matter contained in § 8, under which the respondent was indicted.

Parsons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"By the common law anyone may abate a nuisance to a highway." 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 75, § 12; Id. chap. 76, § 61; 3 Bl. Com. *5. To justify such action, it must appear that the object removed was an obstruction to the public travel,—an actual nuisance. In such case, "whether any object permanently placed, temporarily left, or slowly moving in a public highway" unnecessarily obstructs public travel, and therefore is a common nuisance, is a question of fact to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances of each particular case. Hopkins v. Crombie, 4 N. H. 520, 525; Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257, 69 Am. Dec. 536. "If any timber, lumber, stone, or other thing is upon a highway, encumbering it," a prompt remedy for the immediate removal of the obstruction is provided. Pub. Stat. chap. 77, §§ 1-6. In proceedings under this statute, whether the object complained of is an encumbrance, and its removal necessary for the public convenience, are questions of fact to be determined upon competent evidence. Richardson v. Smith, 59 N. H. 517. The public, however, is entitled to the full and free use of all the territory embraced within the limits of a highway, not only for actual passage, but for all purposes that are legitimately incident thereto. Every actual encroachment upon a highway by the erection of a building or fence thereon, or any other permanent or habitual occupation thereof, is an invasion of the public right, even though it does not operate as an actual obstruction to public travel. Wood, Nuisances, §§ 81, 250. "Where there is a house erected, or an inclosure made, upon any part of the King's demesnes, or of a highway, or common street, or public water, or such like public things, it is properly called a purpresture." 4 Bl. Com. *167. "'Pourpresture' cometh of the French word 'pourprise,' which signifieth a close, or enclosure; that is, where one encroacheth, or maketh several to himself that which ought to be common to many." Co. Litt. 277b; Co. Magna Charta, 38, 272. Any unauthorized erection over a highway is a purpresture. Wood, Nuisances, § 77; Knox v. New York, 55 Barb. 404; Atty. Gen. v. Ewart Booming Co. 34 Mich. 462. Since the public right is coextensive with the limits of the highway, that the traveled part is not thereby impeded is no defense to an indictment charging the erection or maintenance of a building or other construction within the highway. Roscoe, Crim. Ev. 3d Am. ed. 567; Com. v. Wilkinson, 16 Pick. 175, 26 Am. Dec. 654; Com. v. King, 13 Met. 115; Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 234; Harrover v. Ritson, 37 Barb. 303; Dickey v. Maine Teleg. Co. 46 Me. 483; Wright v. Saunders, 65 Barb. 214; Queen v. United Kingdom Electric Teleg. Co. 31 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 167; Res v. Wright, 3 Barn. & Ad. 681; Reimer's Appeal, 100 Pa. 182, 45 Am. Rep. 373. This does not conflict with the adjoining owner's right to make any reasonable temporary use of the street which does not unnecessarily obstruct the public passage. 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 76, § 49; Wood, Nuisances, §§ 256, 257; Res v. Cross, 3 Campb. 224; Res v. Jones, 3 Campb. 230; Winchester v. Capron, H. 520; Makepeace v. Worden, 1 N. H. 16; Avery v. Maxwell, 4 N. H. 36; Copp v. Neal, 7 N. H. 275; Baker v. Shephard, 24 N. H. 208, 213.

The defendant is charged with erecting and continuing a bay window upon and over a public highway. The bay window is a projection from the defendant's building, which extends into and over the highway 4 feet and 7 inches, but does not extend downward within 8 feet of the surface of the way. The sole question reserved is whether, upon the admission of these facts as charged, there is any question for the jury. The defendant claims that these facts do not show such obstruction of the highway as is contemplated in § 8, chap. 77, Pub. Stat., because the bay window does not obstruct the traveled part of the highway, nor interfere with the travel upon the same, and that upon these facts it is a question for the jury whether they constitute an obstruction. The statute is: "If any building, structure, or fence is erected or continued upon or over any highway so as to obstruct the same or lessen the full breadth thereof, it shall be deemed a public nuisance, and any person erecting or continuing the same shall be fined not exceeding fifty dollars; and the court shall order such building, structure, or fence to be removed." The defendant's bay window is a "structure" erected and continued by him over the highway. It lessens the full breadth of the highway 4 feet and 7 inches at a point 8 feet above the ground. The only question is whether the statute is aimed at mere encroachments upon the limits reserved for public use, or has as its object only the removal of actual impediments to the passage. The statute has been the law of the state for nearly 200 years. Its title, when apparently first enacted, in 1714, was "An Act to Prevent Encroachment upon Highways." Laws 1696-1725, p. 32. The provincial act was re-enacted with the same title, with slight verbal change, February 27, 1786. Laws 1797, p. 315; Laws 1805, p. 334; Laws 1830, p. 581. In the revision of 1842 the act appears with the same title, "Encroachments on Highways," but greatly condensed, and in substantially its present form (Rev. Stat. chap. 60), while the provision for the immediate removal of encumbrances is found in the preceding chapter, entitled "Encumbrances in Highways." The substance of the former act was also adopted February 27, 1786. It was not until 1867 that the two provisions were brought together, into one chapter under the present head, "Encumbrances and Encroachments on Highways." Gen. Stat. p. 151, chap. 70. The legislature understood encroachment and encumbrance to be different evils requiring different remedies. An object is not an encumbrance in a highway unless it obstructs the use of the way, while an encroachment is an unlawful gaining upon the right or possession of another; as where a man sets his fence beyond his line. Bouvier, Law Dict. Thus the title furnishes evidence that the object of the statute was the preservation of the limits of the public right, not the prevention of obstruction to travel. The less condensed form of expression of the early statute also gives aid as to its present meaning. Omitting needless repetition not applicable to the present case, it is: "No edifice, building, or fence whatever shall be raised, erected, built, or set up in, upon, over, or across any of the said highways, roads, streets, . . . or any part of them, whereby to stop them up or straighten the passage, or any ways lessen the full breadth of any such street." The three evils which might result from encroachment are described, and were: (1) Stopping up the street, actually preventing passage; (2) straightening, making narrow the path, and the passage difficult; (3) any ways lessening the full breadth of the street. In the modern revisions and re-enactments of the statute the first two are written as a single clause, "to obstruct," but no change has been made in the last,—"lessen the full breadth of the street." If a jury might find that the defendant's bay window did not stop up the street or straighten the passage, they could not find that, projecting 4 feet and 7 inches over the highway, it does not to some extent lessen its full breadth. That a building so projecting into the highway upon the surface, but not so as to obstruct travel, is in violation of the statute, was decided in 1829 in Hopkins v. Crombie, 4 N. H. 520. The case was trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close and removing a house frame. The defense set up was that the house was within the limits of the highway, and under the statute was an obstruction and nuisance, wherefore the defendants, selectmen of the town, entered, and removed the same. The court,—Richardson, Ch. J.,—said (p. 525): "This statute [February 27, 1786] was not, in our opinion, intended to make mere encroachments upon highways, where the passage was not obstructed, liable to be removed by individuals. The object was to prevent certain encroachments upon highways, and for this purpose they are declared to be common nuisances, and provision made for their removal and the punishment of the offender. Individuals are permitted to abate actual nuisances which obstruct the passage of highways, because the public convenience requires an immediate remedy, and cannot wait for the slow progress of the ordinary course of justice. But no such reason exists for the interference of individuals in this way, in the case of encroachments which do not obstruct the passage. The statute has not changed the nature of things, and made that an actual obstruction which was not so before its enactment." It was further held in the same case that the cellar and frame complained of, which extended 10 feet within the limits of the highway, but in no way impeded, or obstructed, or rendered less safe or convenient the traveled path, was clearly an encroachment, for the simple reason that it was within the limits of the highway. It was said to be (p. 526) "clearly an illegal encroachment, which rendered the plaintiffs liable to be indicted and punished, and which might at any time, upon a conviction, have been legally taken down, demolished, and removed." For this reason, although, since the frame did not obstruct the travel, the defendants' acts in removing it were unlawful, the plaintiffs were allowed only nominal damages.

Under Hopkins v. Crombie, the only question remaining is whether the elevation of the projecting structure 8 feet above the highway surface raises any question of fact under the statute. If it does, it is only because at that elevation a jury might find it did not in fact obstruct the public in their use of the way. But if such a finding, which might, and probably must, have been found in Hopkins v. Crombie, does not excuse a building upon the surface of the way made because abundant space was left on one side of the structure for the public passage, the same finding cannot avail when based on the ground that there is abundant room beneath the structure. The finding being immaterial, a different ground upon which it might be based is equally unimportant. Further evidence of the understanding of the legislature is to be found in the section of the statute immediately following: "Signs and awnings put up in conformity with the police regulations in force in the town are excepted from the provisions of the preceding section." Pub. Stat. chap. 77, § 9. This exception appeared first in the Revised Statutes of 1842 (Rev. Stat. chap. 60, § 2), presumably considered necessary because in 1823 police officers were authorized to make regulations for the height and position of any awning, shade, or other fixture that may be erected or placed in any such street (Laws 1830, p. 271; Rev. Stat. chap. 114, § 7; Pub. Stat. chap. 249, § 5). The legislature understood that a sign or awning over a highway was within the statute. The projection of the roof and eaves of a house over and into a street is within the statute, and a building so constructed is a nuisance. Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 55, 20 Am. Rep. 164. "Whether the fee of the street be in the municipality in trust for the public use, or in the adjoining proprietor, it is in either case of the essence of the street that it is public, and hence . . . under the paramount control of the legislature as the representative of the public." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2d ed. § 541. The reasonable and proper use which the adjoining owner may make of the way is subject to legislative regulation. Id. § 585; 3 Kent, Com. *433; Allen v. Boston, 159 Mass. 324, 335, 34 N. E. 519. Buildings projecting over a highway may make doubtful the true line of the street, as well as those erected upon the surface, and render the way dangerous to the public use. Whether any such use should be permitted is properly determinable by the 48 L. R. A.

legislature. Considering the common-law rule that any encroachment upon a highway is unlawful, the object of the statute, as disclosed by its title, the language used in the original and subsequent enactments of the section in question, the exceptions made by the legislature tending to establish the legislative understanding of the meaning of the section, the existence of another statute remedy for the removal of actual obstructions, and the previous interpretation that has been declared by the court, we entertain no doubt that the construction contended for by the defendant cannot be sustained. The facts agreed contain all the elements of the offense charged. There is no question for the jury.

Trees by the side of the roadway (Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 270, 69 Am. Dec. 536), are not within the terms of this statute, and are recognized and protected by law. Pub. Stat. chap. 266, § 19. While the suggestion of the defendant's brief that the omission of the clause, "so as to obstruct the same, or lessen the full breadth thereof," would leave the statute with precisely the meaning given to it is undoubtedly true, yet we do not think the insertion of this clause authorizes the position that there may be a structure upon or over a highway which does not either obstruct it or lessen its full breadth. Such a structure is plainly inconceivable, and the proposition is self-contradictory. If the structure is upon or over the highway, it must either obstruct it or lessen its full breadth. If it does neither, it is neither upon nor over the highway. The origin of the clause is to be found in the excessive particularity of the original draftsman in the effort, by a superabundance of words, to exclude the possibility of failure to embrace within the terms of the statute every variety of encroachment. The clause is in fact a recital of evils guarded against, and not the insertion of a condition to be found as a fact. The original laying of the street is conclusive that the whole space is necessary for the public use, either for passage, or the necessary incidents thereto. Whether the space reserved can, consistently with safety to the public, be permanently encroached upon by structures overhanging the same, other than signs and awnings, is purely a legislative question. As the case and the law now stand, the defendant's window is an illegal encroachment upon the street. The legislature has not left it to the court to decide whether, as a purpresture merely, it should be allowed to remain. Wood, Nuisances, § 80. The statute declares it a nuisance, and orders its removal. Further proceedings in accordance with these views and the stipulations of the reserved case will be had at the trial term.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

Claus DETTMERING, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Richard ENGLISH.

(.....N. J.....)

1. Plaintiff received an injury from the fall of a wall which was being constructed by workmen of the defendant. Plaintiff was lawfully on the premises where the wall was being constructed. Held, that defendant owed plaintiff a duty to take reasonable care that the wall should be so constructed as not to fall.
2. At the close of the whole evidence the trial judge directed a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the single question presented was whether the wall in question should have been braced, and that upon the evidence it appeared that bracing was unnecessary. Held, that, under the circumstances appearing in the case, there was a question for the jury, and it was error to withdraw it from them by a direction.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hudson County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Flavel McGee for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Corbin & Corbin, for defendant in error:

Plaintiff cannot avail himself of grounds of negligence not pleaded. He must set out the facts showing negligence.

Race v. Easton & A. R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 533, 41 Atl. 710.

The absence of braces on the south side was not evidence of negligence.

Usage is the test of ordinary care.

It is a mistake for one to take his stand after an accident, and to impute responsibility from a view thus obtained. It is nearly always easy, after an accident has happened, to see how it could have been avoided.

Crane v. Northfield, 33 Vt. 126; Bliss v. Wilbraham, 8 Allen, 564.

MAGIE, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Dettmering brought this action against English to recover damages for an injury received by him by the fall of a portion of a wall which was being constructed by English for the city hall of Jersey City. English had contracted with the city for the mason and iron work of the city hall, and had subcontracted the iron work to the Fagin Iron Works, in the employ of which Dettmering was working on the building. The occurrence is the same which was before the court of errors in Jansen v. Jersey City, 61 N. J. L. 243, 39 Atl. 1025. On the authority of that case, the employees of English in building the wall which fell were not fellow servants of Dettmering.

The bills of exception show that at the close of plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was interposed on the ground that there was a failure of proof of any negligence on the part of English, or of any negligence which was chargeable to him. The trial judge reserved decision on motion, and proceeded to hear the evidence of the defendant. At the close of the whole case defendant asked for a direction for a verdict in his favor upon the same ground upon which he had moved for the nonsuit. This motion was granted; the trial judge giving as a reason that the only question in the case was whether the wall that fell should have been braced, and that it then appeared to him, on the evidence, that bracing was not necessary. Exception was allowed to the direction of a verdict, and plaintiff's main contention is directed to it as erroneous. The bill of exceptions presenting this question contains the whole evidence adduced at the trial. It appears therefrom that Dettmering was lawfully upon the premises, engaged in his duty to his employer in performing the work which the Fagin Iron Works had contracted with English to do. It follows that English owed to Dettmering a duty to take reasonable care that the wall in question should be so constructed as not to fall upon and injure him while thus lawfully on the premises. If, upon the evidence, a reasonable inference of failure to perform that duty could be drawn by the jury, it was obviously erroneous to withdraw the case from the jury by the direction for a verdict. Such a course could only be justified by the total lack of evidence from which such an inference could properly be drawn. It appears from the evidence that the wall in question was about 80 feet long, and had been built of a width of 16 inches to a height of about 60 feet, and had been allowed to dry and settle for some days. Then the workmen of English commenced to build thereon a wall of 12 inches in width, and within two days had completed it for the whole length to the additional height of 18 or 20 feet, when it, or part of it just erected, fell upon the plaintiff. It is evident that the trial judge conceived that the sole question was whether the duty of English required him to brace the wall then in course of construction, and, upon his finding that such bracing was unnecessary, his direction for the verdict was grounded. It is at least open to doubt whether the view taken by the trial judge was not too narrow. The wall was of brick, and it is a matter of common knowledge that when such cubes are laid one upon another, with care to keep the wall plumb, it will stand by virtue of the law of gravity; and a fall of a wall of brick would indicate either that it had been improperly laid, or that the fall had been caused by some force from without. Under such circumstances it may well be that the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, would be applicable, and one who constructed a wall which thus fell might be required to show the cause of the fall, and that it was not the result of negligent construction. That would justify a resort to evidence such as was adduced by English, of a sudden and violent gust of wind occurring at the time the wall fell. Whether that was sufficient to account for the fall, or whether the probability of such an occurrence was within the contemplation of a prudent man engaged in the erection of a wall at such a height, and whether such probability required some protection by bracing or otherwise, would then be questions for a jury. Again, it might be open to question whether a jury might not be permitted to infer a lack of duty on English's part in erecting this part of the wall in haste, and without giving time for drying and settling. But, looking at the evidence as the trial judge did, I have reached the conclusion that it was erroneous to withdraw the case from the jury. On the part of Dettmering there was evidence offered, which was rejected by the court below, which, it is claimed, tended to show that, in the customary mode of erecting such walls, bracing was resorted to as a protection against falling. If the evidence offered was adapted to show the ordinary and customary mode of erection, it may have been admissible; but the questions asked, and excluded by the court, called for the observation of witnesses in isolated cases, and, if answered, would not have tended to prove any general custom. It may be that the evidence would have been admissible in rebuttal of defendant's proof that bracing was not customary or possible under the circumstances, but the questions asked and rejected in plaintiff's original case were not renewed in rebuttal. The evidence, however, clearly shows that bracing was provided for by the plans. There was a wall of the building already erected, and parallel to that which fell, and 8 or 9 feet distant from it. Iron beams were designed to be fastened or anchored at the top of that wall, and to extend to, and be masoned in, the wall that fell. There was evidence that such beams were provided, and were masoned in the wall in question. There was evidence, however, that the ends of some of them, at least, were not fastened or anchored in the parallel wall. It is true that the evidence on that subject was controverted, but it was for the jury to judge the weight of evidence, and the credit to be given to witnesses from whom it was drawn; for such beams were obviously intended as braces, and, if they were left unfastened to the parallel wall, it raised a question as to the performance by English of his duty in constructing this wall. It was not for the court to pronounce such bracing unnecessary.

The result is that the judgment founded upon the verdict so erroneously directed must be reversed for a venire de novo.

BUFFALO GERMAN INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

THIRD NATIONAL BANK OF BUFFALO, Resp't.

(162 N. Y. 163.)

1. A statement to a bank by a borrower, that stock in his safe may be considered as collateral for his loans, is executory in its nature so long as the stock remains in his possession and until it is in fact pledged to the bank by a delivery.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of an Equity Term for Erie County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to compel the transfer of stock upon the books of the defendant corporation. Reversed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

This action was brought to obtain a judgment directing the defendant to transfer upon its books to the plaintiff 450 shares of its capital stock. All of these shares stood in the name of Emanuel Levi, who had, some years previously, pledged the same with, and delivered the certificates thereof to, the plaintiff, to secure the payment of his promissory notes for moneys loaned. At the time that he so pledged the shares of stock, he executed and delivered to it an assignment of the same in the usual form, by which he assigned and transferred to it, by name, the shares of defendant's capital stock standing in his name on the books, and constituted one of the officers of the plaintiff his attorney to effect the transfer thereof, etc. He at the same time executed and delivered to the plaintiff a receipt for the moneys loaned to him, which stated the rate of interest the loan should carry, the assignment of collateral security for its payment, and that the plaintiff was authorized, in case of default in payment of the principal and interest of the loan, to sell the securities at public or private sale, etc. Levi having died, a demand was made upon his executors for payment of the notes, with notice that, in the event the same were not paid, and the stock redeemed, on or before a certain date, the stock would be sold at public auction, and the proceeds applied in liquidation of the indebtedness of their testator. On June 30, 1896, a public sale was regularly had, at which the stock was purchased by the plaintiff. Thereafter, a demand of the plaintiff upon the defendant to transfer the stock so purchased upon its books was refused. The defendant claims a lien upon the stock by force of a statement printed upon the face of the certificates, in the following language: "This is to certify that Emanuel Levi is the owner of ——— shares of one hundred dollars each of the capital stock of the Third National Bank of Buffalo, subject to the lien referred to in section 15 of the by-laws of said bank in the following words: 'No transfer of the stock of this association shall be made without the consent of the board of directors by any stockholder who shall be liable to the association, either as principal debtor or otherwise, which liability shall be a lien upon the said stock and all profits thereof and dividends.' And that the said stock is transferable only upon the books of the bank by him or his attorney on the surrender and cancelation of this certificate and on compliance with said by-law." Levi had been a director of the defendant, and at the time he pledged his stock to the plaintiff he was under an indebtedness to the defendant. The trial judge made this finding with respect to it: "That at the time of the sale of the stock in question to, and its purchase by, the plaintiff, the estate of Emanuel Levi was largely indebted to the defendant, and the defendant then had and now has a right to a lien upon said certificates and stock as security for the payment thereof; that Levi's indebtedness to the defendant accrued prior to the pledge of any of said certificates to the plaintiff; that no tender or offer to pay said indebtedness by the plaintiff, or by any other person or party, has ever been made; that the plaintiff was notified of the defendant's claim before the sale of June 30, 1896, and the defendant forbade such sale except subject to the defendant's claims, demands, and liens." The defendant at no time had possession of Levi's certificates of stock, and its claim is of an equitable lien upon the same for all the indebtedness owing by him as its stockholder, by reason of the statement upon the certificates. It is also claimed that he orally stated to the defendant's president that "he had a large amount of stock in the bank, and that was security for his loans," and that, though "it was in the safe-deposit vault," the bank "could consider it there as delivered as collateral to its loan." The trial court made no finding as to these facts, nor otherwise upon the subject than the finding above given. The conclusion reached by the trial court upon the facts was, in substance, that the defendant had a lien upon the stock for the amount of the indebtedness existing against the estate of Levi, when the certificates were purchased by the plaintiff, and that the latter's right to a transfer to itself of the stock was subject to the lien of the former. Judgment was entered dismissing the complaint upon the merits, upon the sole ground that the plaintiff is entitled to a transfer of the stock in question by the defendant, and to have new certificates issued to it in place of those to be surrendered and canceled, when, but not until, it should pay to the defendant an amount sufficient to satisfy its lien for the indebtedness to it owing by Levi's estate. This judgment was affirmed in the appellate division by a divided court, and the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

Messrs. Hickman & Palmer, for appellant:

There is no authority in the law for the enactment of a by-law containing the provisions of § 15 in this bank's by-laws, and there is an express provision prohibiting any such by-law in the act of Congress, which prohibits the bank from loaning on the security of its own stock.

The defendant had no actual pledge of the stock in suit as collateral for any indebtedness which Levi might have owed it.

To make a valid pledge there must be delivery, actual or constructive, of the pledge by the pledgee or his agent, into the possession of the pledgee or his agent, in order to pass any right of property in the thing pledged.

right, and the plaintiff having taken the stock of the defendant, with notice of the defendant's rights therein, because the stock contains a notice thereof, it follows that the plaintiff acquired its lien subject to the lien of the defendant, and the plaintiff cannot compel the defendant to transfer the stock upon its books until the plaintiff has redeemed the stock from the lien of the defendant thereon.

Defendant's answer to this equitable suit of the plaintiff is a perfect answer upon the undisputed facts in this case, because the plaintiff cannot maintain this suit if the Levi estate could not maintain this suit.

The plaintiff put this stock in evidence as a part of its evidence, and therefore the recital of this document put in evidence by plaintiff, and transferred to plaintiff, raises a presumption of the fact recited, unless plaintiff overcomes that recital by evidence that it is untrue.

1 Greenl. Ev. 14th ed. § 23.

The by-law of the defendant, made a part of its stock certificate, is not void, and is not repugnant to the statute; but it is part of the very stock and contract with Levi, of which plaintiff claims the benefit as the privy and assignee of Levi; hence plaintiff is a party thereto, and is estopped from claiming it does not bind plaintiff as a part of such contract and collateral.

The by-law and the stock itself, and the arrangement made with Levi when the loan was made, together, give the defendant an equitable lien upon the stock.

3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1233.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decision of the question in this case turns upon provisions of the national banking act, passed by Congress in 1864, and the construction which they should receive in the light of opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The original act for the incorporation of national banks, which was passed in 1863, contained, in § 36, the provision that the capital stock "shall be assignable on the books of the association in such manner as its by-laws shall prescribe, but no shareholder in any association under this act shall have power to sell or transfer any share held in his own right so long as he shall be liable, either as principal debtor, surety, or otherwise, to the association for any debt which shall have become due and remain unpaid; . . . and no stock shall be transferred without the consent of a majority of the directors while the holder thereof is thus indebted to the association." In 1864 the act of 1863 was repealed by a new enactment as to national banking associations, whereby it was provided, in § 35, "that no association shall make any loan or discount on the security of the shares of its own capital stock, nor be purchaser or holder of any such shares, unless such security or purchase shall be necessary to prevent loss upon a debt previously contracted in good faith," etc. 13 Stat. at L. 110, chap. 106. The act of 1864 did not reenact any of the provisions which were contained in § 36 of the act of 1863, and the section, therefore, was expressly repealed. Bullard v. National Eagle Bank, 18 Wall. 594, 21 L. ed. 923. The defendant was organized under the act of 1864, and there was not only no authority in the act for the by-law referred to and embodied in the language of the certificates of stock, but such a by-law would be inconsistent therewith. Bullard v. National Eagle Bank, 18 Wall. 594, 21 L. ed. 923. The restrictions imposed by § 36 of the act of 1863 upon the shareholders had been removed, and banking associations were prohibited from permitting any indebtedness on the part of their stockholders upon the security of the shares of their own capital stock. It would seem, therefore, that a by-law seeking to impose restrictions upon transfers of stock by declaring a lien upon the stock to the extent of any liability of the stockholder to the bank would be quite inoperative to accomplish such a purpose, and, equally so, any statement upon the certificate of stock based upon the existence of such a by-law. The bank being prohibited from loaning moneys upon the security of its own shares of capital stock, it is difficult to understand upon what legal principle it could claim the right to an equitable lien. The appellate division, in an opinion which was concurred in by the majority of the justices of that court, thought that, as the question was one which arose under a Federal law, it should be governed in its determination by the decisions of the Supreme Federal Court, and that the more recent ones had established a controlling doctrine that a contract made in contravention of any provision of the national banking act is not, in the absence of any declaration to that effect, void, or incapable of enforcement. Under the authority of certain cases in the United States Supreme Court, which are considered in the opinion, it was pointed out that the validity of certain transactions by national banks with their debtors was held to be a question only for the government to raise, and that the effect of their violation of the statute was, not to invalidate the transaction itself, but to subject them to charter proceedings on the part of the government. Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188; National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 443; Thompson v. Saint Nicholas Nat. Bank, 146 U. S. 240, 36 L. ed. 956, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 66. Hence it was deemed to follow that in the present case the bank's claim to be entitled to an equitable lien, though against a purchaser for value, and in good faith, of its shares in the market, must be allowed, and any offense against the banking act involved must be left to governmental cognizance. I believe this conclusion to be fallacious, and that the reasoning of the learned justices below is without regard to the distinction which exists between those cases in their facts and in the principle underlying their decision, and the earlier cases which construed the national banking acts, and declared the doctrine that loans by banking associations to their stockholders do not give a lien to the bank upon their stock. First Nat. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. 369, 20 L. ed. 172; Bullard v. National Eagle Bank, 18 Wall. 589, 21 L. ed. 923. I am quite unable to agree in the view that these earlier cases have been overruled, or their doctrine refused credit, by the later cases which are relied upon for the defendant. If we assume the existence of a contract between the defendant bank and Levi (and all we know of it is the testimony of the president of the defendant as to a conversation with Levi, in which he said the bank could consider the stock in his safe as collateral for his loans), it was executory in its nature as long as the stock remained in his possession, and until it was in fact pledged to the bank by a delivery. Possession is of the essence of a pledge, in order to raise a privilege against third persons. Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 24 L. ed. 779; Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443, 51 Am. Dec. 307.

The defendant is asking the court to declare an equitable lien in its favor upon the shares of stock against a third person, and in that respect the case is unlike those cases where the Federal court has held that a national bank might enforce a security which it had taken and held, notwithstanding the claim of the borrower that the transaction was in violation of some express provision of the law. The defendant never had possession of the stock, and, being under the prohibition of the banking act as to a transaction of a loan upon the security of its own shares of stock, it is compelled to take the position that, having dealt with Levi upon the faith that his ownership of the stock would be an added security for the performance of his promise to pay his loans, and the certificates of stock carrying notice to persons dealing with Levi with respect to them that any transfer thereof would be subject to a lien in favor of the bank for any liability of the stockholder, it should be allowed an equitable lien thereon, superior to any right of the plaintiff thereto. I should say that there was a marked difference between any such claim of the bank, which slights a provision of the banking law, intended to negative the right to a lien and to confer the valuable character of transferability upon national bank shares, in the public interests, and a claim which a borrower or his representative asserts against the right of a national bank, as his creditor, to realize its debt upon securities which have been held by it in pledge, though not within the class of those it was authorized to hold. The demand of the bank is to have the court declare an equitable lien upon its outstanding stock by virtue of a by-law and of notice thereof on the certificates, when the banking act prohibited loans by it upon the security of its own shares, and thereby rendered any by-law in contravention of the act, or any notice based thereon, wholly inoperative.

In First Nat. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. 369, 20 L. ed. 172, the certificate of stock declared that the shares were transferable on the books of the bank only on surrender of the certificates. This limitation was imposed by the by-laws, which further provided that the stock of the bank should be assignable, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the 36th section of the act of 1863. Lanier and Handy purchased the stock of Culver, to whom it had been issued, and, their request for a transfer being refused, an action was brought against the bank to obtain pecuniary satisfaction. The bank defended upon the ground that it had a lien upon the stock for Culver's indebtedness to it, by virtue of the provisions of the 36th section of the act of 1863, which remained in operation, notwithstanding its repeal in 1864, by means of a by-law, adopted while the section was in force, declaring that the stock should be transferable subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act of Congress aforesaid. It appeared that the bank had sold and transferred the Culver shares upon its books to a third person, and had applied the proceeds of the sale upon the indebtedness, before Culver assigned the certificates to Lanier and Handy. It was held that the provisions of the act of 1864 governed the conduct of banking associations, whether they were organized before or after it became a law, and that the prohibition upon the making of loans on the security of the shares of their own capital stock applied. The object of the new act was stated to be to make national banks subserve public purposes, and to place shareholders, in their pecuniary dealings with the bank, on the same footing with other customers. It was a change in the policy of the government, and, as the restrictions of the act of 1863 fell, "so did that part of the bank's by-law relating to the subject fall with them." The judgment against the bank was affirmed.

In Bullard v. National Eagle Bank, 18 Wall. 594, 21 L. ed. 923, the defendant was organized under the national banking act of 1864, and issued to one Clapp certain shares of its capital stock. He borrowed moneys from the bank on his notes, and subsequently was adjudged a bankrupt. The plaintiff, as his trustee in bankruptcy, demanded a transfer of the stock to him as part of the bankrupt's assets; but the bank refused, claiming a lien upon it, by force of its by-law, to the extent of the notes held by it. The action was then brought against the bank for refusing to allow the transfer asked for, and the questions certified for determination were whether a national bank could acquire a valid lien upon the shares of its stockholders by its articles or by-laws, and whether the bank was entitled to hold the interest of Clapp in the stock by way of lien, or security for all or any of the notes. It was held, on the authority of the Lanier Case, 11 Wall. 369, 20 L. ed. 172, that these questions must be answered in the negative. 48 L. R. A.

Mr. Justice Strong, who delivered the opinion of the court, observed that the repeal of the 36th section of the act of 1863 by the substituted act of 1864, "was a manifestation of a purpose to withhold from banking associations a lien upon the stock of their debtors," and that a by-law founded upon the 36th section of the act of 1863 was "a regulation inconsistent with the new currency act, the policy of which was to permit no liens in favor of a bank upon the stock of its debtors." It was there argued for the bank that, though the act of Congress does not itself create a lien on a debtor's stock (as did the act of 1863), it does, by its 5th section, authorize the creation of such a lien by the articles of association and by by-laws made under them. But it was answered that the words of the 5th section would bear no such meaning, and that a by-law giving to the bank a lien upon its stock, as against indebted stockholders, ought not to be considered as one of those regulations of the business of the bank, or for the conduct of its affairs, which it was authorized to adopt, and that Congress evidently did not understand the section as extending to the subject of stock transfers, because in another part of the statute express provision was made for them.

The doctrine of First Nat. Bank v. Lanier, was followed in this court in Conklin v. Second Nat. Bank, 45 N. Y. 655, where the stock certificates contained the statement that the stock was not transferable "until all liabilities of the stockholder to the bank were paid." The rule of the Lanier Case was held applicable to the transaction between the bank and the plaintiff's assignor, and it was held, against the claim of the bank to a lien upon the stock for moneys due from the stockholder, that "when the statute has prohibited all express agreements between a bank and its stockholders or a lien in favor of the former upon the stock of the latter to secure any debts or liabilities of the stockholders to the bank, that no such lien can be created by a mere by-law of the bank is too clear to require discussion."

Do the cases which are cited and relied upon below as establishing a new doctrine apply to the present case, and come to the support of the defendant's position? They are Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188, and National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 443. The national banking law authorizes a national banking association to loan money on personal security, and then declares that "it may purchase, hold, and convey real estate for the following purposes, and no others: First, such as may be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business; second, such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted; third, such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings; fourth, such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts to it." In the case of Union

Nat. Bank v. Matthews, Matthews and another person had given their joint note to a mercantile company, and secured it by a deed of trust, covering certain real property, executed by Matthews alone. Subsequently the company assigned the note and deed of trust to the defendant bank to secure a loan made at the time. The loan was not paid, and the bank directed the trustee to sell. In the state courts Matthews obtained a perpetual injunction against the sale, upon the ground that the loan was made upon real-estate security, which was forbidden by the statute, and the deed of trust was therefore void. The case was taken by writ of error to the United States Supreme Court, where the decree of the state court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the court below to dismiss the bill. It was held that the prohibitory clause of the national banking law did not vitiate real-estate securities taken for loans, and that a disregard of the law only laid the association open to proceedings by the government. Justice Swayne remarked that "the impending danger of a judgment of ouster and dissolution was, we think, the check, and none other, contemplated by Congress." The guiding principle of the decision, however, was that it would be inequitable that a borrower should be rewarded by giving success to his defense of the invalidity of the bank's act in taking a prohibited security for its loan, and that, as a punishment was prescribed for the violation of its charter, it was for the government to object. See p. 629, L. ed. p. 190. In National Bank v. Whitney, Whitney had executed a mortgage to the bank, which declared that it was made as collateral security for the payment of all notes which the bank held at the time against him, and for his other indebtedness then due or thereafter to become due. The question for determination was stated to be whether the mortgage was valid so far as it applied to future advances to him. The question was regarded as determined by the decision in Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, which was reviewed in the opinion. It was observed that, "whatever objection there may be to it, as security for such advances, from the prohibitory provisions of statute, the objection can only be urged by the government." In both these cases the bank held the trust deed or mortgage, and was endeavoring to enforce the security which it actually had taken from its debtor.

In First Nat. Bank v. Stewart, 107 U. S. 676, 27 L. ed. 592, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 778, the bank had taken, as security for a debt due from the stockholder, thirty shares of its own stock, and upon default in payment had sold the same, and applied the proceeds in payment of the debt. The action was brought to recover back the proceeds of sale upon the ground that the bank had no right to take the security. The right to recover was denied upon the ground that "the contract has been executed, the security sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt," and that "both bank and borrower are, in such case, equally the objects of legal censure, and they will be left by the courts 43 L. R. A.

where they have placed themselves." By suing for the proceeds of the sale, it was observed, the plaintiffs had affirmed the sale, and the moneys loaned were an offset to the proceeds.

In Thompson v. Saint Nicholas Nat. Bank, 146 U. S. 240, 36 L. ed. 956, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 66, the question arose upon the overcertification of a check, in violation of the United States statute which made it "unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any national bank to certify any check drawn upon said bank, unless the person or company drawing said check shall have on deposit in said bank, at the time such check is certified, an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check." The statute further provided that any check so certified shall be a good and valid obligation against said bank, but that any officer, etc., violating the provisions of the act, would subject the bank to proceedings on the part of the comptroller for the appointment of a receiver to wind up the affairs of the association. 13 Stat. at L. 114, chap. 106. The action was brought to recover the possession of certain railroad bonds, which the bank was charged with having become illegally possessed of. The bank answered that the bonds had been pledged to it as collateral security for call loans or advances, and that, the pledgeors having failed to pay their indebtedness, the bonds had been sold under an agreement permitting the bank to do so upon the pledgeor's default. The question was whether, inasmuch as the defendant had certified checks without having on deposit an equivalent amount of money to meet them, it became a bona fide holder of the bonds. Upon the authority of the cases of Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews and National Bank v. Whitney, it was held that, "where the provisions of the national banking act prohibit certain acts by banks, or their officers, without imposing any penalty or forfeiture applicable to particular transactions which have been executed, their validity can be questioned only by the United States, and not by private parties." This clause from the opinion is quoted below in the present case, but I fail to perceive its precise applicability. The transaction, as in First Nat. Bank v. Stewart, had been executed. Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews and National Bank v. Whitney, only, of these cases, might be claimed to have a bearing upon the discussion; but their analogy is not apparent. I do not think that the United States Supreme Court intended to announce any new rule, for they simply applied a doctrine established as early as in the case of Fleckner v. Bank of United States, 8 Wheat. 339, 5 L. ed. 631. That the Matthews and Whitney Cases have not overruled the doctrine of the Latier and Bullard Cases or of the Conklin Case in this court, with respect to the enforceability of such a by-law as the bank had in this case, is the general understanding of text writers, and it has been so understood by courts. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 201, §§ 14, 15; Evansville Nat. Bank v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 2 Biss. 527, Fed. Cas. No. 4,573; Continental Nat. Bank v. Eliot Nat. Bank, 7 Fed. Rep. 376; New Orleans Nat. Bkg. Asso. v. Wiltz, 10 Fed. Rep. 330; Fechheimer v. National Esch. Bank, 79 Va. 80.

I do not understand that by virtue of any rule established in the Matthews and Whitney Cases, a national banking association is enabled, by force of a by-law, or by a notice upon certificates, to restrict the transferability of its stock by imposing a lien thereon for any liability owing to it by its stockholder. How can it reserve to itself a right to a lien upon shares of its own stock, in contravention of the provisions of the national banking act, and become entitled to demand of the courts to enforce it as against a purchaser of the shares, whose title thereto is acquired bona fide, and for value? If the defendant bank can successfully insist upon the right to an equitable lien, which the courts must enforce in the face of the statutory prohibition, then I do not see that certificates of capital stock in national banking associations will possess that marketable character which has been considered to give them a greater value as investments. The transferability of the stock is one of the most valuable franchises conferred by Congress upon banking associations as it was said by Mr. Justice Davis in the Lanier Case. The learned judge further remarked, in that case: "It is no less the interest of the shareholder than the public that the certificate representing his stock should be in a form to secure public confidence, for without this he could not negotiate it to any advantage." Nor can it be said that this plaintiff, when offered by Levi the certificates of stock as collateral security for a loan of money, was chargeable with notice of any lien of the bank thereon. The certificates were in his possession, and were delivered to the plaintiff; and the printed matter thereon was of no importance, inasmuch as the public law, under which the bank was organized, prohibited it from making any loan or discount on the security of the shares of its own capital stock. The plaintiff could not be bound by notice of something which the law prohibited. The plaintiff, in the language of Justice Davis in the Lanier Case, was "told, under the seal of the corporation, that the shareholder is entitled to so much stock, which can be transferred on the books of the corporation, in person or by attorney, when the certificates are surrendered, but not otherwise. This is a notification to all persons interested to know that whoever in good faith buys the stock, and produces to the corporation the certificates, regularly assigned, with power to transfer, is entitled to have the stock transferred to him. And the notification goes further, for it assures the holder that the corporation will not transfer the stock to anyone not in possession of the certificates." If the case had been one where the bank, not regarding the prohibition of the banking act, had taken from Levi his certificates of stock as collateral security for the payment of any indebtedness which he had incurred or might incur, and had realized upon them for application upon his debt, it might well be that it would not lie in his mouth, or anyone claiming under him, to assert the illegality of the transaction. The case would then resemble more the cases of Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews or First Nat. Bank v. Stewart. If the bank had violated the law, it laid itself open to proceedings on the part of the government, and the courts might leave the parties where they were, and might decline to interfere to benefit the borrower to the prejudice of the stockholders and creditors. There is no conflict between the Lanier and Bullard Cases and the Matthews and Whitney Cases. Each class is distinct, and its doctrine is controlling where the principle involved is the same. It is one thing if the contract has been executed, and to avoid it would be to deplete the assets of the bank to the amount represented by the contract. It is quite another thing where the bank is seeking to create a lien upon an implied executory contract, or a security where it has none, and where it admits it has none, in the face of the statute which provides that it shall not have such a lien or take such a security.

The conclusion I reach is that the cases relied upon in the court below in the decision of this case do not control it. They do not authorize the assertion of an equitable lien by the bank upon the shares of its own capital stock; and the plaintiff, having acquired the certificates from Levi, the stockholder, for value, and in good faith, was entitled to have the same absolutely transferred into its name upon the books of the corporation.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

SCHOOL BOARD OF THE BOROUGH OF QUEENS, New York City, Respt.

(161 N. Y. 598.)

1. The right of colored children to attend any school they or their parents may choose, instead of being restricted to the separate schools established for colored children, is not conferred by Pen. Code, § 883, which makes it a misdemeanor for teachers or officers of schools to exclude any citizen from the equal enjoyment of any accommodation or privilege, if the schools for colored children furnish facilities and accommodations equal to those which are furnished by the other schools.

NOTE.—As to the rights of colored children in schools, see cases in note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. E. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. on page 581.

2. The constitutional requirement of the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools wherein all the children of the state may be educated does not require a school board to admit to any school under its control all the children who may desire to attend that particular school, or prevent the legislature from exercising its discretion as to the best method of educating the different classes of children in the state, whether those classes are determined by nationality, color, or ability, so long as it provides for all alike in the character and extent of the education furnished and facilities for its acquirement.

APPEAL by relator from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Queens County denying a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to admit relator's children into one of the public schools. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George Wallace, for appellant:

The court of appeals, in its latest deliverance on the subject, holds that there can be no distinction on account of color in the admission of persons to places of amusement, to common schools, or their bodies to the cemetery.

People v. King, 110 N. Y. 418, 1 L. R. A. 293, 18 N. E. 245.

Messrs. William J. Carr and John Whalen, for respondent:

The school board had the power to organize a separate school for the instruction of children of African descent, and to assign thereto the children of the relator.

People ex rel. King v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 438, 45 Am. Rep. 232; Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 405; Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, 17 Am. Rep. 738; Roberts v. Boston, 5 Cush. 198; Lehen v. Brummell, 103 Mo. 546, 11 L. R. A. 828, 15 S. W. 765; McMillan v. School Committee, 107 N. C. 609, 10 L. R. A. 823, 12 S. E. 330; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 133 U. S. 587, 33 L. ed. 784, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 801, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 348.

Equality of rights does not involve the necessity of educating white and colored persons in the same school, any more than it does that of educating children of both sexes in the same school, or that different grades of scholars must be kept in the same school. Any classification which preserves substantially equal school advantages is not prohibited by either the state or the Federal Constitution, nor would it contravene the provisions of either.

State ex rel. Barnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 211.

Martin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question in this case is whether the school board of the borough of Queens is authorized to maintain separate schools for the education of the colored children within the borough, and to exclude them from the other schools therein, it having 48 L. R. A.

ing made the same provisions for their education as are made for others, so far as the nature, extent, and character of the education and facilities for obtaining it are concerned. In People ex rel. King v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 438, the statute of 1864, which was the common school act, chapter 143, Laws 1850, and chapter 863, Laws 1873, which related to the public schools of the city of Brooklyn, were under consideration. They authorized the establishment of separate schools for the education of the colored race in cities and villages of the state, and in the city of Brooklyn. In that case it was held that they were valid, that they did not deprive children of African descent from the full and equal enjoyment of any accommodation, advantage, facility, or privilege accorded to them by law, and that they in no way discriminated against colored children. It was also held that the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution only required that such children should have the same privilege of obtaining an education with equal facilities as are enjoyed by others, without regard to race or color, and that the requirement that they should be educated in separate schools did not impair or interfere with their rights under the Constitution, or with any other legal rights of colored pupils. The consolidated school law (Laws 1894, chap. 556, title 15, § 28) contains the same provisions relating to this subject as were contained in the statute of 1864. Thus, the same statutory authority for the maintenance of such separate schools now exists as existed when the King Case was decided. Therefore, as this question has already been decided, it is not an open one in this court.

But it is insisted by the appellant that, as the Penal Code (§ 383) makes it a misdemeanor for teachers or officers of common schools and public institutions of learning to exclude any citizen from the equal enjoyment of any accommodation or privilege, it in effect confers upon colored children the right to attend any school they or their parents may choose, and that the school board had no authority to establish separate schools and deny them the right to attend elsewhere. The first answer to this insistence is that the Penal Code was in existence at the time of the decision of the King Case, and must be regarded as having been considered in that case. Moreover, independently of that decision, we do not see how that statute changes the effect of the conclusion reached in the case referred to, provided the facilities and accommodations which were furnished in the separate schools were equal to those furnished in the other schools of the borough. It is equal school facilities and accommodations that are required to be furnished, and not equal social opportunities. The case of People v. King, 110 N. Y. 418, 1 L. R. A. 293, 18 N. E. 245, is relied upon as modifying or overruling People ex rel. King v. Gallagher. We do not think such is its effect. In the former case a colored person was excluded from a place of public amusement controlled by the defendant, and it was there held that the latter was guilty of a misdemeanor. In that case there was a total denial of the complainant's right to attend or to participate in the enjoyment of the entertainment. There no other accommodation or facility was furnished by the defendant. Not so here. In this case the colored children were given the same facilities and accommodations as others. We are of the opinion that the case of People v. King neither modifies nor affects the principle of the decision in People ex rel. King v. Gallagher, so far as it applies to the question under consideration.

Again, it is said that the present Constitution requires the legislature to provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this state may be educated, and therefore the school board was required to admit to any school under its control all the children who desired to attend that particular school. Such a construction of the Constitution would not only render the school system utterly impracticable, but no such purpose was ever intended. There is nothing in that provision of the Constitution which justifies any such claim. The most that the Constitution requires the legislature to do is to furnish a system of common schools where each and every child may be educated,—not that all must be educated in any one school, but that it shall provide or furnish a school or schools where each and all may have the advantages guaranteed by that instrument. If the legislature determined that it was wise for one class of pupils to be educated by themselves, there is nothing in the Constitution to deprive it of the right to so provide. It was the facilities for and the advantages of an education that it was required to furnish to all the children, and not that it should provide for them any particular class of associates while such education was being obtained. In this case, there is no claim that the relator's children were excluded from the common schools of the borough, but the claim is that they were excluded from one or more particular schools which they desired to attend, and that they possessed the legal right to attend those schools, although they were given equal accommodations and advantages in another and separate school. We find nothing in the Constitution which deprived the school board of the proper management of the schools in its charge, or from determining where different classes of pupils should be educated, always providing, however, that the accommodations and facilities were equal for all. Nor is there anything in this provision of the Constitution which prevented the legislature from exercising its discretion as to the best method of educating the different classes of children in the state, whether it relates to separate classes, as determined by nationality, color, or ability, so long as it provides for all alike in the character and extent of the education which it furnished and the facilities for its acquirement.

The order should be affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK CENTRAL & HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY. Appt.

1. All controverted facts, and all inferences therefrom, must be deemed conclusively established in favor of the party for whom judgment is rendered, when both parties are in the position of having asked for the direction of a verdict.
2. A railroad company is liable for the loss of a sample trunk on a contract for its transportation as freight, where it was checked without any misrepresentation, and without any release of liability or any request therefor, on payment of a charge for excess baggage, which was the same for sample trunks as for ordinary baggage, and the baggageman had constructive notice of the character of the trunk from its appearance and from other circumstances, although there was a rule of the company prohibiting the checking of sample trunks without a release of liability.
3. Both parties are deemed to have asked for the direction of a verdict, where defendant's counsel, after moving unsuccessfully for a nonsuit, replied to an inquiry from the court, that he did not care to have any question submitted to the jury, and, after a request by plaintiff's counsel for the direction of a verdict, stated that he desired to stand on his motion for a nonsuit, while neither party asked to have any question of fact submitted to the jury.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Monroe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the destruction of a trunk while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Harris & Harris, for appellant:

The defendant was not liable for the loss of these samples, and the plaintiff should have been nonsuited.

Mr. David Hays, for respondent:

At common law the carrier of goods was responsible for all losses not occasioned by the act of God or of the public enemy.

Story, Bailm. § 491.

The right of a passenger to take with him as baggage such articles as may be reasonably necessary for his convenience on the journey has always been accorded by carriers of persons to attract travelers.

Merrill v. Grinnell, 30 N. Y. 594.

The term "baggage" was limited to such personal effects as were ordinarily taken by travelers for their personal use and convenience. The rule defining the general meaning of the word "baggage" has varied from time to time, according to changes in the customs of carriers and travelers.

Lawson, Bailm. § 273.

During the past quarter of a century a large and lucrative part of the passenger business of railroad companies has consisted in carrying traveling salesmen and their samples.

It has inured greatly to the profit of the railroads to have the system of the sale of goods on the road by commercial travelers substituted in place of the former custom of merchants making their purchases at the manufacturing centers. In order to promote the change it was necessary for the railroad companies to permit the sample trunks of the traveling salesmen to be carried on passenger trains with them.

The fact that merchandise so accepted by the carrier does not come within the definition of personal baggage cannot relieve the carrier from all liability respecting it.

Schouler, Bailm. § 673; 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1649.

The defendant having received the trunk with notice that it contained property other than the personal baggage of the passenger, and having charged extra compensation for its transportation, it is liable for its loss.

Each party having clothed the court with the functions of the jury, the verdict for the plaintiff stands as would the finding of a jury. All the controverted facts and all inferable facts in support of the judgment will be deemed conclusively established in favor of the plaintiff.

Smith v. Weston, 159 N. Y. 194, 54 N. E. 38; Adams v. Roscoe Lumber Co. 159 N. Y. 176, 53 N. E. 805.

The judgment is conclusive with respect to the following facts:

1. That the defendant had notice that the trunk contained property other than Taylor's baggage.

2. That the defendant had notice that the trunk and its contents were not Taylor's property.

3. That it was the defendant's custom to check trunks of commercial travelers containing samples of merchandise in the same manner, and for the same compensation, and for transportation on the same trains, as ordinary baggage.

4. That the defendant's servants in its baggage room were authorized to check sample trunks of commercial travelers as baggage.

The plaintiff's right of action does not depend upon proof of all the foregoing facts, but they are all in the case, and strengthen his position.

Sloman v. Great Western R. Co. 67 N. Y. 208; Talcott v. Wabash R. Co. 159 N. Y. 461, 54 N. E. 1.

The regulation of the defendant, unknown to the passenger, requiring its baggage agent to exact a release, cannot relieve the defendant from its responsibility.

Talcott v. Wabash R. Co. 159 N. Y. 461, 54 N. E. 1; 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1649; Hutchinson, Carr. § 269; Lawson, Bailm. § 284.

Even if it had been the custom of the defendant to exact releases, and Taylor knew it, the defendant would, nevertheless, be liable in this case, having waived the condition.

Rathbone v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 140 N. Y. 48, 35 N. E. 418; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Foster, 104 Ind. 293, 54 Am. Rep. 319, 4 N. E. 20.

The defendant is liable on the ground of negligence.

The plaintiff having proved delivery of the property to the defendant in good condition, and the defendant having assumed to carry it, and the owner having demanded it at the place of destination, where the defendant produced it in a ruined condition, the damage is presumed to have been due to defendant's negligence.

Fairfax v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 11, 73 N. Y. 167, 29 Am. Rep. 119; Canfield v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 93 N. Y. 532, 45 Am. Rep. 268.

The facts set forth in the complaint constitute a cause of action for negligence, as well as for breach of contract.

Catlin v. Adirondack Co. 11 Abb. N. C. 377; Curtis v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 74 N. Y. 116, 30 Am. Rep. 271.

The limitation contained in the passenger ticket does not affect the plaintiff's right to recover.

The ticket is a mere token or voucher, and a notice on it does not bind a passenger as by contract.

Perkins v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 190, 82 Am. Dec. 281; Blossom v. Dodd, 43 N. Y. 264, 3 Am. Rep. 701.

Assuming the notice on the ticket to have any force, it might excuse the defendant from its common-law liability as insurer, but it would not excuse it from liability for negligence, as it does not expressly exempt from such liability.

Myard v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 180, 27 Am. Rep. 28; Rathbone v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 140 N. Y. 48, 35 N. E. 418.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought to recover the value of a trunk and its contents destroyed while in the possession of the defendant, to which it had been delivered by the plaintiff's assignors for transportation from Rochester to New York on the evening of October 23, 1897. Curtis & Wheeler were manufacturers of shoes in the city of Rochester, and Joseph E. Taylor acted as their traveling salesman on the 23d day of October, 1897, and had been in their employ in that capacity for a period of nine years. On the evening in question, Taylor, acting for his employers, went from Rochester to New York on business. Before starting he arranged with the baggageman of the defendant for the transportation of a trunk and an article called a "telescope." The trunk and its contents, consisting of samples of shoes, belonged to Curtis & Wheeler, except a few articles of wearing apparel, the property of Taylor, for which no claim is made. The telescope contained the wearing apparel of Taylor. For the trunk Taylor received from the baggageman a card known as "Excess Baggage Check," for which he paid 85 cents excess of baggage. For the telescope he received the ordinary metallic check. Taylor described the trunk, when a witness at the trial, as a regular sample trunk, made of wood and covered with canvas, about 32 or 34 inches in height, 36 to 38 inches in length, and 22 to 24 inches in width. The "number taker" of the Rochester baggageroom was sworn, and stated that he took a record of the baggage in and out. He produced a sheet containing a record covering October 23, 1897, which showed the description of plaintiff's baggage as a sample trunk. He further testified that he so designated it from its appearance. Taylor testified that he had been in the habit of leaving Rochester with his samples on an average of four, six, or eight times a year for about twelve years. The night checkman was sworn for defendant, and stated that he did not know what the contents of the trunk were, and that nothing was said to him as to the contents. He was asked on cross-examination if he remembered anything about this particular trunk, or its appearance. He answered, "I couldn't just now; no." It is to be observed that this witness was not asked by defendant's counsel whether he recognized this piece of baggage as a sample trunk from its external appearance. He does not contradict the number taker as to the external appearance of the baggage showing it was a sample trunk. The defendant does not question receiving the trunk, or the failure to deliver it, but insists it is not liable for its loss, with contents, for the reason that Taylor, when paying for excess of baggage on the trunk, failed to inform the checkman that it contained samples. The learned counsel for the defendant very frankly states in his brief that it is true the trunk was what is commonly known as a "sample trunk," and had the appearance of one, but nevertheless argues that the plaintiff should have been nonsuited.

The liability of common carriers for the loss of sample trunks carried by commercial travelers in the transaction of their business has been frequently considered by the courts of this and other jurisdictions during the last twenty-five years, and, while the decisions are conflicting, many of them are distinguishable in their facts from the case at bar. The law relating to this subject has been in a state of evolution, and certain rules have finally been laid down in this state, calculated to protect the rights of both parties, in view of the fact that a vast amount of the wholesale business of the country is transacted through commercial travelers, to the great profit of the railroad companies and convenience of merchants. As this case is in the position where each party is to be regarded as having requested the direction of a verdict (a point we will discuss later), and the trial judge having directed a verdict for the plaintiff, all the controverted facts, and all inferences in support of the judgment, will be deemed conclusively established in his favor.

The defendant read in evidence certain rules of the company which provide, in brief, that baggage consists only of necessary wearing apparel, limited to 150 pounds in weight; that sample baggage, of not more than 150 pounds, will be checked free for one person, regardless of the number or kind of tickets presented. Rule 4 reads as follows: "Small cases or trunks containing merchandise will be carried as an accommodation to commercial travelers, and may be checked when release of liability, Form 220, is signed in consideration of its transportation on passenger trains as baggage. In case personal baggage and samples are contained in same trunk, a release must be signed for samples, and agents will refuse to check the same unless this is done." The release referred to absolves the company from all liability for loss, detention, or damage to the trunk or its contents. It is urged on behalf of the defendant that rule 4 limited the authority of the baggageman, and that he was unauthorized to check a sample trunk without exacting the release. This court has held that the baggage agent stands in the place of the railroad company. Talcott v. Wabash R. Co. 150 N. Y. 471, 54 N. E. 1. And the record in the case before us shows that no release was exacted, nor was plaintiff's agent aware of the rule. The plaintiff's agent testified that he had on a number of occasions signed this release when he desired to stop at several stations between Rochester and New York, as he could settle for excess of baggage through to New York for less than to pay this excess from each station at which he stopped. On cross-examination he was asked:

Q. I ask you if you did not know the fact that when the baggagemaster knew that your trunk contained samples, or any other traveling man's trunk contained samples, that this release of liability was executed?

A. No, sir; I had no knowledge of that. I knew that I had from time to time executed those releases on my sample baggage.

On re-direct examination he was asked:

Q. When you say that you had executed those releases, you refer to the releases which you described before, in order to save paying excess of baggage from each place when you departed?

A. Yes, sir; no release was presented to me, nor did I sign any release, nor was I asked to, when I checked this trunk in controversy.

The defendant's checkman or baggagemaster does not deny this statement.

This case presents the question whether the baggageman of the defendant, who checked the lost trunk and collected excess of baggage thereon, knew that it was a commercial traveler's trunk, from surrounding facts and circumstances, and defendant was thus chargeable with notice. This court has held that notice may be given to the common carrier by other means than the direct statement of the owner that he is a commercial traveler, and that his trunk contains samples. In Sloman v. Great Western R. Co. 67 N. Y. 208, plaintiff's son, a lad of eighteen years of age, was employed by him as traveling agent to sell goods by sample. He had two large trunks containing the samples, different from ordinary traveling trunks, and had a valise for his personal baggage. He delivered the trunks to a baggagemaster at a railroad depot, and, when asked to which station he wished them checked, replied that he did not then know, as he had sent a despatch to a customer at a certain place to know if he wanted any goods. If not, he desired them to go to a certain other place, where he expected to meet customers. Soon after he checked his baggage, and paid $2 for extra weight. Judge Rapallo, in his opinion, said: "It does not appear that it was stated, in terms, to the baggagemaster what the trunks contained, but the jury had the right to consider the surrounding circumstances, the appearance of the passenger and of the articles, the conversation between the passenger and the baggagemaster, and the dealing between them, and, if they indicated that the trunks were not ordinary baggage, or received or treated as such, the jury had the right to draw the inference of notice, and that they were received as freight." In Talcott v. Wabash R. Co. 159 N. Y. 461, 54 N. E. 1, it appeared that when weighing the trunks the agent of the company observed "they weighed light," and the traveler replied, "Yes; they contain samples of underwear." Judge Vann, referring to this incident in the opinion of the court, at page 471, 159 N. Y., and page 4, 54 N. E., said: "The number and appearance of the trunks was some evidence that they contained merchandise, and the agent was expressly told that they contained samples. In view of the custom proved, that commercial travelers generally carry samples belonging to their employers in their trunks, this warranted the inference that the baggage agent knew the exact facts." In the case at bar there were facts warranting the submission of the question to the jury, or the trial judge, as to whether defendant was charged with knowledge of the character of the trunk, through its agent; the external appearance of a regular sample trunk; the readiness with which it was recognized as such by the official "number taker;" the fact that defendant was constantly checking sample trunks on all of its passenger trains except the Empire State Express; the further fact that for about twelve years plaintiff's agent had been traveling on defendant's road with a sample trunk, and leaving Rochester six or eight times a year; the fact that sample trunks were checked for the same compensation as ordinary baggage,—these and any other relevant facts were properly considered when the verdict was directed, and the facts warranted by the evidence stand conclusively established in favor of the plaintiff. While it is doubtless the better practice, as suggested by defendant's counsel, that a traveler in charge of a sample trunk should state to the baggage agent the fact when he seeks to check it, yet if, in the haste of transacting such business, or where, by many repetitions of the act, much is taken for granted, this is not done, it would be a harsh and unreasonable rule that precluded the plaintiff from submitting to the jury the facts surrounding the transaction. The recovery in this case was not on the contract of passage entered into when the plaintiff's agent purchased his ticket, but on an independent agreement for the transportation of the sample trunk as freight. In Sloman v. Great Western R. Co. 67 N. Y. at page 214, Judge Rapallo said: "From all the circumstances, the jury were, we think, authorized to draw the inference that the baggagemaster understood that the agent was traveling for the purpose of selling goods, and that these trunks contained his wares; that he was not entitled to have them carried as his ordinary baggage, and therefore, the extra charge was made, and they were carried as freight." In Talcott v. Wabash R. Co. 159 N. Y., at page 470, 54 N. E. 3, this case was cited and followed. The Sloman Case also authorizes a recovery by a plaintiff where this independent contract is made by his salesman as agent. 67 N. Y. 212.

There remains to be considered one other question. The learned appellate division in its opinion stated, in substance, that, as neither counsel raised the point that there were any questions of fact to be submitted to the jury, the effect was to establish the facts, if any there were, in favor of the plaintiff. As the correctness of the practice at the trial is challenged, we will consider the question. At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant's counsel moved for a nonsuit upon various grounds stated by him, which motion was denied. He then asked the court, "What question will your honor submit to the jury?" To this the court inquired, "What question do you desire to submit to the jury?" To which the defendant's counsel answered, "I do not desire to have any question submitted to the jury." Thereupon the plaintiff's counsel stated that he was willing to leave it to the court, to which the defendant's counsel answered, "I stand on my motion for a nonsuit, of course." The plaintiff's counsel then asked for a direction of a verdict, which was objected to by the defendant's counsel, but was granted by the court. A verdict was directed, and an exception taken by the defendant. Neither party asked to have any question of fact submitted to the jury. In the case of Adams v. Roscoe Lumber Co. 159 N. Y. 176, 53 N. E. 806, O'Brien, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the value of the lumber, with damages for its detention, and the defendant excepted. The request by both parties for the direction of a verdict amounted to a submission of the whole case to the trial judge, and his decision upon the facts has the same effect as if the jury had found a verdict in the plaintiff's favor after submitting the case to them. Under these circumstances, the judgment is conclusive with respect to the two facts upon which the right of action depended." To the same effect are the cases of Smith v. Weston, 159 N. Y. 194, 54 N. E. 38; Thompson v. Simpson, 128 N. Y. 270, 283, 28 N. E. 627; Koehler v. Adler, 78 N. Y. 287.

It is contended, however, that as the defendant asked for a nonsuit, instead of a directed verdict, the foregoing cases have no application. It must be borne in mind that in this case, after the denial of his motion for a nonsuit, the defendant's counsel asked the court what question his honor would submit to the jury, and that the court then inquired of him what question he wanted submitted, and he answered that he did not desire any question submitted to the jury. In the case of Barnes v. Perina, 12 N. Y. 18, after the evidence had closed, the counsel for the defendant moved for a nonsuit. The motion was denied, and the defendant excepted. The court thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff, directed a verdict in his favor. Allen, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If the defendant supposed that there was a disputed question of fact, material to the issue between the parties, he should have made a distinct request that it should be submitted to the jury. But having treated the questions as purely legal, and acquiesced in the disposal of them by the court as such, he cannot now be heard to object that facts were involved which should have been decided by the jury." In Winchell v. Hicks, 18 N. Y. 558, the motion was also for a nonsuit at the conclusion of the evidence, which was denied, and a verdict directed in favor of the plaintiff. In that case it was held that the defendant, moving at the conclusion of the evidence for a nonsuit, which is denied, if he desires that questions of fact be submitted to the jury, must distinctly request it, and cannot upon appeal make the point under a general exception to the judge's direction of a verdict. In the case of O'Neill v. James, 43 N. Y. 84, there was a motion for a nonsuit, which was denied, and the jury directed to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the damages sustained. It was held that where a party, upon the trial, rests his case upon certain positions which he calls upon the court to rule in his favor as questions of law arising upon undisputed facts, if he also desires that any question of fact in the case be submitted to the jury, he must make a motion to that effect. In the absence of this, his mere exception to the ruling of the judge that there is no question for the jury is unavailing. See also Ormes v. Dauchy, 82 N. Y. 443, 37 Am. Rep. 583; Dillon v. Cookcroft, 90 N. Y. 649. In the case of Stone v. Flower, 47 N. Y. 566, the trial court directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff, however, had not waived his right to have the questions of fact involved in the case submitted to the jury by any motion on his part for such a direction, and it was held that he was entitled to have his exception taken to the direction of a verdict reviewed; but Grover, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, refers with approval to Barnes v. Perina, Winchell v. Hicks, and O'Neill v. James, above cited, and distinguishes the case under consideration by him from the rule adopted in those cases. In Clemence v. Auburn, 66 N. Y. 334, and in Pratt v. Dwelling House Mut. F. Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 212, 29 N. E. 117, relied upon as supporting a different rule, there was no waiver by the appellant, by motion to direct a verdict or for a nonsuit. The cases cited, of Dwight v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 103 N. Y. 341, 57 Am. Rep. 729, 8 N. E. 654; Bagley v. Bowe, 105 N. Y. 171, 59 Am. Rep. 488, 11 N. E. 386, and Bulger v. Rosa, 119 N. Y. 459, 24 N. E. 853, have no application to the case at bar, as here the proceedings at the close of the trial were, in legal effect, a request by both counsel for a directed verdict.

The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

Haight, Martin, and Vann, JJ., concur.

O'Brien, J., dissenting:

This was an action by the assignee of a commercial firm for the loss of a trunk which was carried by the traveling salesman of the firm, and was lost by the defendant. This trunk contained sample merchandise of the character in which the firm dealt, and was put upon one of the defendant's trains by direction of the salesman, who was a passenger from Rochester to New York, on the 23d day of October, 1897. The salesman purchased a passage ticket on the defendant's road from Rochester to New York, which contained the following limitation: "In consideration of extended time within which journey may be begun, holder hereof releases R. R. Co. from all liability as to baggage, except for wearing apparel, not exceeding in value one hundred dollars." The salesman procured the trunk to be delivered at the railroad station, and checked as baggage, paying 85 cents for excessive weight. By the defendant's rules a passenger is entitled to have carried free 150 pounds of personal baggage, and by this rule baggage consists only of wearing apparel and such personal effects as may be necessary for the use and comfort of the passenger while traveling. Baggage in excess of that amount was to be paid for. The rule also provides that sample cases or trunks containing merchandise will be carried as an accommodation to commercial travelers, and may be checked when a release from liability is signed in consideration of its transportation on passenger trains as baggage; and, in case personal baggage and samples of merchandise are contained in the same trunk, a release must be signed for the samples, and agents are directed to refuse to check the same unless this is done. The baggagemen by this rule are directed to refuse to check baggage that does not consist strictly of personal effects unless this release is properly filled out and signed by the owner, or the agent of the owner. The form of this release appears in this case, and by its terms the company is discharged from all liability for baggage, whether the same arises from carelessness or negligence, however gross, on the part of the company, or its agents or servants, or from any cause whatever. It appears that the salesman who had the trunk in question had on previous occasions signed these releases, though he stated that he never read them, but that there was no release signed on the occasion of the delivery of the trunk in question, nor did he make known to any of the servants of the company its contents; and there is no evidence in the case to show that the defendant, or any of its servants, on this or any other occasion knew the fact that the trunk carried by this salesman contained merchandise, except as that fact was to be inferred from its appearance. It appears that the salesman had been in the employ of the firm for about twelve years, and during that time had been a passenger upon the defendant's road, but whether the trunk in question had ever been seen prior to the occasion in question by any of the defendant's agents or servants at Rochester does not appear. The claim for damages for the loss of the trunk was assigned by the firm to the plaintiff. These are the undisputed facts that appear in the record, and the question is whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

At the close of the proofs the defendant's counsel made a motion for a nonsuit on the 48 L. R. A. ground, among others, that there was no evidence that the defendant had any knowledge that the trunk contained merchandise, and that there was no proof of a contract to carry a trunk containing merchandise on a passenger train, and that, inasmuch as the trunk did not contain baggage, there could be no recovery. The motion was denied, and the defendant excepted. The defendant's counsel then asked the court what question he proposed to submit to the jury. The court then asked the defendant's counsel what question he desired to submit to the jury, and the counsel replied that he did not desire to have any question submitted. The plaintiff's counsel then stated that he proposed to leave the case to the court, if the defendant's counsel was willing. The defendant's counsel did not accept this offer, but stated explicitly that he proposed to stand on his motion for a nonsuit. The plaintiff's counsel then asked the court to direct a verdict in his favor for the value of the trunk and contents, being $542.10, and $35 interest. The defendant's counsel objected to the direction of a verdict for the plaintiff, and made a special objection to the allowance of interest, but these objections were overruled. The court then directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $577.10, and to this direction the defendant's counsel excepted. The questions of law presented by the record are therefore before this court for review.

The plaintiff cannot recover in this case unless he established a contract, express or implied, on the part of the defendant to carry merchandise for the salesman on a passenger train. It is not, and cannot be, claimed that there was any express contract creating the relations of a common carrier of goods between the salesman and the defendant. The only express contract made is represented by the passenger ticket sold to the salesman, and that was a contract to carry him as a passenger, with his personal baggage. But it turned out that what he had in the trunk was goods, and not baggage, which, under the defendant's rules, it did not carry on passenger trains, except in cases where the owner or passenger signed a release for any claim for damages in case of loss from any cause whatever. So that the salesman caused the trunk in question to be placed on a passenger train without any express contract on the part of the defendant to carry or be responsible for it. Moreover, the defendant contends that the salesman caused the trunk to be placed upon the defendant's passenger train, against its rules, as baggage, when in fact it was not baggage, but goods. There is but one ground upon which the defendant can lawfully be required to respond for the loss of the trunk and its contents, and that is in case it received and checked the same upon the train with knowledge of the fact that it contained goods instead of baggage. When a passenger who desires to have goods carried with him on a passenger train gives notice of that fact to the carrier, and the latter has notice of the fact in any way, and then receives and checks the trunk containing the goods, the relation of carrier and shipper is created by the transaction, with all its duties and responsibilities. Stoman v. Great Western R. Co. 67 N. Y. 208; Stoneman v. Erie R. Co. 52 N. Y. 429. But, in the absence of proof showing or tending to show knowledge of the contents of the trunk or package by the carrier in such cases, there can be no recovery, and such knowledge cannot be inferred from the appearance of the trunk or package containing the goods. Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 827, 37 L. ed. 587, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 711; Gurney v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 37 N. Y. S. R. 155, 14 N. Y. Supp. 321, Affirmed on opinion below in 138 N. Y. 638, 34 N. E. 512; Cahill v. London & N. W. R. Co. 10 C. B. N. S. 154, Affirmed in 13 C. B. N. S. 818; Blumantel v. Fitchburg R. Co. 127 Mass. 322, 34 Am. Rep. 376; Alling v. Boston & A. R. Co. 126 Mass. 121, 30 Am. Rep. 667.

The case, therefore, is solved by a very simple inquiry, and that is whether there is in the record anything showing or tending to show that the defendant had knowledge of the contents of the trunk in question when it received and checked it upon the train on the 23d of October, 1897, other than the appearance of the same, which, it is held, is no evidence of knowledge at all. I confess I am unable to find any. It is said that the salesman was traveling as such for twelve years, but it does not appear that at any time he notified the defendant of the contents of the trunk, or that the defendant at any time acquired the knowledge in any other way, so that the case stands upon the transaction when the trunk was shipped for the last time. A fact or circumstance that in itself proves nothing is not made any stronger when multiplied by twelve or any larger number. In my opinion, there was no proof in the case to warrant a finding that the defendant had notice or any knowledge of the fact that the trunk in question contained goods instead of baggage. But the learned trial judge evidently thought otherwise, and it distinctly appears from the opinion of the learned court below that reviewed the case on appeal that it held that whether the defendant had or had not such notice or knowledge was a disputed question of fact. Grant, for the sake of the argument, that this view is correct, still the disputed fact was not found by the jury, and the action was one at law, triable by jury. Either party had the constitutional right to have the facts determined by the jury. The learned court below held that the disputed fact necessary to support the plaintiff's case was found by the court without the aid of the jury, and that it had the right to take the question from the jury and decide it itself. This is an obvious error, since the doctrine upon which it is based would go far to destroy the right of trial by jury altogether. If sustained by this court, all that will be necessary hereafter, when the plaintiff in an action at law has given proof of some fact or circumstances which no one claims is conclusive in support of an issue of fact, is to request the trial judge to direct a verdict in his favor; and, if such a direction is given against the defendant's objection and exception, still the disputed and necessary fact is to be deemed found by the court. The defendant could not be deprived of the right of a jury trial without its consent. It gave no such consent, nor did its counsel in any way waive the right. He moved for a nonsuit, and excepted to the denial of his motion. He told the court that he had no question to submit to the jury, and obviously he had none, from his view of the case, since he had just contended in his motion for a nonsuit that there was no case for the jury, as there was no proof that the defendant had knowledge of the contents of the trunk. He told the court that he stood upon his motion for a nonsuit, and objected and excepted to the direction. How, under such circumstances, he consented to have the facts found by the court, or waived his rights to have them found by the jury, it is impossible to conceive. The defendant's counsel did not need any finding, and did not want any finding. All he asked was that his client should be left alone. When his motion for a nonsuit was denied, and he concluded to stand upon that, he had no interest in anything else that took place. But it was quite different with the plaintiff. Before he could have judgment in his favor, it was necessary that the important fact in dispute should be found in his favor, and it was his business to procure the finding in the proper way. The defendant's counsel could remain silent, and let the plaintiff try his side of the case. The plaintiff's counsel should then have gone to the jury, and asked them to find the disputed fact, which was an essential part of his case, and which the other side was not interested in at all. When he asked and accepted the direction of a verdict in his favor by the court, he asked and accepted what he was not entitled to. The learned counsel for the plaintiff cites two cases to show that this practice is correct. Smith v. Weston, 159 N. Y. 104, 54 N. E. 38; Adams v. Roscoe Lumber Co. 159 N. Y. 176, 53 N. E. 805. They have no application to the question here, since it appears that they are cases where both sides asked the court to direct a verdict. All the parties may by such a request clothe the court with power to decide all the questions in the case, but it has never been held that one party could do it against the protest of the other. It is safe to say that no authority can be found to justify the practice followed in this case, and it has been often condemned in this court. The rule that governs the question has been thus stated in this court more than once: "In a case triable by a jury, the direction of a verdict is only justified where the evidence conclusively establishes the right of the party in whose favor it is made." Bulger v. Rosa, 119 N. Y. 450, 24 N. E. 853; Bagley v. Bowe, 105 N. Y. 171, 59 Am. Rep. 488, 11 N. E. 836; Dwight v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 103 N. Y. 341, 57 Am. Rep. 729, 8 N. E. 654. It is not necessary for the party against whom a verdict is directed upon evidence not conclusive to show that he requested to have the case sent to the jury. Stone v. Flower, 47 N. Y. 566; Clemence v. Auburn, 66 N. Y. 334; Pratt v. Dwelling House Mut. F. Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 212, 29 N. E. 117. It would indeed be a rule of practice bordering on the absurd that would require a defendant in a case where a fact is in dispute, in order to preserve his right to have the fact found by the jury, to assert by such a request that there is evidence tending to prove the plaintiff's case, when, upon a motion for a nonsuit just denied, he contended that there was no evidence whatever. He may preserve his rights by an exception to the direction of a verdict, and without taking two positions before the court so manifestly inconsistent. It is only necessary to add that, if there is in this record any evidence at all of knowledge by the defendant of the contents of the trunk, no one ventures to assert that it was conclusive. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

Parker, Ch. J., concurs.

Landon, J., dissents upon the ground that defendant having, notwithstanding the denial of its motion for a nonsuit, objected to a direction of a verdict, the court should have submitted the facts to the jury.

EAST RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY, Appt.

1. A statement in an order of the appellate division, that it reverses the judgment of the trial court "upon the law and the facts," will not prevent a review by the court of appeals if the only question is whether the transaction as disclosed by the facts was forbidden by a statute.
2. A withdrawal of the funds of a corporation from a bank that is about to fail, upon a check signed by the president of the corporation, although he was also a director of the bank and his knowledge of its condition was acquired by him as such director, does not violate the stock corporation law, § 48, which prohibits any transfer of assets or payment by the bank or any officer, director, or stockholder thereof, with intent to prefer any creditor, when the bank is insolvent or its insolvency imminent.
3. A communication by a director of a bank of his knowledge that it is about to fail, though made to a depositor which is a corporation of which he is president, does not violate the stock corporation

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment entered in the office of the clerk of New York County upon the report of the referee in its favor in an action brought to compel repayment of money withdrawn from a bank upon the eve of its insolvency. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward Lauterbach and Eugene Treadwell, for appellant:

There was no transfer by anyone prohibited by the statute.

The act forbidden must be by an officer, director, or stockholder acting in the interest of, on the part of, or for, the insolvent corporation, and no disability is imposed upon action in any other capacity by the coincidence of holding one of such positions.

The statute only restricted Mr. Uhlman's action as director for the bank, and did not impose any disability upon his performance of his duty as president of the bridge company.

Varnum v. Hart, 119 N. Y. 101, 23 N. E. 183; French v. Andrews, 145 N. Y. 444, 40 N. E. 214; Milbank v. De Riesthal, 82 Hun, 537, 31 N. Y. Supp. 522; Cummings v. Mayer, 26 Abb. N. C. 257, 12 N. Y. Supp. 651; Dickson v. Mayer, 58 Hun, 609, 12 N. Y. Supp. 359.

The check was drawn by the defendant corporation for its own benefit.

Under such circumstances it is immaterial that the president of the defendant corporation was a director in the Madison Square Bank.

Kingsley v. First Nat. Bank, 31 Hun, 329.

A director is not prohibited from transferring his own claim, even where it results in the transferee collecting from the insolvent company.

Jefferson County Nat. Bank v. Townley, 159 N. Y. 490, 54 N. E. 74.

In the absence of clear provision, the prohibition will not be extended by construction so as to affect or disable the creditor.

Tompkins v. Hunter, 149 N. Y. 117, 43 N. E. 532; Blakey v. Booneville Nat. Bank, 95 Fed. Rep. 267.

The defendant was not restricted by knowledge of the insolvency of the Madison Square Bank.

Uhlman was responsible to the defendant company for the same degree of care and prudence that men prompted by self-interest ordinarily exercise in their own affairs.

Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 65, 37 Am. Rep. 546.

If Uhlman had had a personal-deposit account with the bank, he could have transferred it for value to an assignee who might have collected the same exactly as the East River Bridge Company's check was collected.

No payment with intent to prefer was shown.

Constructive payment, or payment by ratification, though sufficient to support an ordinary action on contract, is not the payment prohibited by the statute.

The officers of the corporation are not bound to oppose affirmative action to a just claim.

Messrs. Samuel Untermyer and Louis Marshall, for respondents:

The payment to the East River Bridge Company of the proceeds of the $50,000 check drawn by Uhlman,—a director of the Madison Square Bank, at a time when he knew that the bank was insolvent, was under the conceded facts a violation of § 48 of the stock corporation law.

Where there is a concurrence of these elements (a) any form of transfer of corporate property, (b) by any agency, (c) corporate insolvency or its imminence, (d) the intent of giving a preference,—the courts will intervene to set aside the transfer.

Whatever knowledge Uhlman acquired on the evening of August 8 as a director of the Madison Square Bank, relative to its condition, he also had on that evening as the representative of the East River Bridge Company. The knowledge which he possessed came to him while engaged in the very transaction which resulted in the preference to the corporation of which he was the president.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs, as receivers of the Madison Square Bank, brought this action to compel the defendant to account and pay over to them $50,000 which the defendant had deposited in the bank, but drew out by check on the day the bank closed. The cause was tried before a referee, who dismissed the complaint, but this judgment has been reversed by the appellate division. The facts upon which the judgment depends are undisputed. They are fully stated in the learned opinion below, and that statement can be very safely adopted as it there appears: "On the 8th of August, 1893, the defendant was a depositor in the Madison Square Bank, and it had standing to its credit on the books of the bank on that day the sum of $50,000. As to that amount, the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor, and no other, existed between the bank and the depositor. On the night of the 8th of August, 1893, it became known to Frederick Uhlman, a director of the Madison Square Bank, and also the president of the East River Bridge Company, that the bank was insolvent, or in imminent danger of insolvency, and that it would be closed the following day. Frederick Uhlman also knew that the St. Nicholas Bank was the agent at the clearing house of the Madison Square Bank, and that on the 8th of August, 1893, the St. Nicholas Bank had in its possession a large amount of securities belonging to the Madison Square Bank, and that it held such securities as collateral for any and all obligations as agent of the Madison Square Bank. He also knew that the St. Nicholas Bank had notified the clearing house that it would cease to act for the Madison Square Bank, and that the St. Nicholas Bank, by the rules and regulations of the clearing house, was responsible for all checks of the Madison Square Bank that would be presented at the clearing house in the exchanges on the morning of the 9th of August. All this knowledge was acquired by Frederick Uhlman as a director of the Madison Square Bank. On the night of August 8, Simon Uhlman, who was largely interested in the stock of the East River Bridge Company, learned of the imminence of insolvency of the Madison Square Bank, and that it would probably be closed the following morning. Thereupon he caused a check to be filled up, drawn upon the Madison Square Bank, for $50,000, and took it to the treasurer of the defendant at Brooklyn, where it was signed by such treasurer at about eleven o'clock at night. That being done, Simon Uhlman returned to New York city with the check, and handed it to Frederick Uhlman, who also signed it, as president of the East River Bridge Company, and retained it in his possession over night. Early on the morning of the 9th of August, Frederick Uhlman took the check to the Hanover National Bank, and instructed the authorities of that bank to have it presented at the clearing house that morning, so that it might be paid by the St. Nicholas Bank in the exchanges of that morning, and thus be credited to the East River Bridge Company, and a withdrawal effected of so much from the funds and moneys or securities of the Madison Square Bank under the control of the St. Nicholas Bank. The check was presented at, and passed through, the clearing house. The East River Bridge Company received a credit with the Hanover Bank, and thus the transfer of the $50,000 was completely made from the Madison Square Bank to the defendant. The Madison Square Bank was closed on the morning of the 9th of August, or, more properly speaking, was never opened for business after the 8th, and went into insolvency."

There is no dispute about these facts, nor are they open to different inferences. The only question is with respect to the law, or, in other words, whether the transaction was forbidden by the statute. Hence the judgment is reviewable in this court, notwithstanding the statement in the order that the reversal was upon the law and the facts.

The only authority claimed in behalf of the plaintiffs to sustain the judgment is § 48 of the stock corporation law, which reads as follows: "No corporation which shall have refused to pay any of its notes or other obligations when due, in lawful money of the United States, nor any of its officers or directors, shall transfer any of its property to any of its officers, directors, or stockholders, directly or indirectly, for the payment of any debt, or upon any other consideration than the full value of the property paid in cash. No conveyance, assignment, or transfer of any property of any such corporation by it or by any officer, director, or stockholder thereof, nor any payment made, judgment suffered, lien created, or security given by it or by any officer, director, or stockholder when the corporation is insolvent or its insolvency is imminent, with the intent of giving a preference to any particular creditor over other creditors of the corporation, shall be valid. Every person receiving by means of any such prohibited act or deed any property of the corporation shall be bound to account therefor to its creditors or stockholders or other trustees. No stockholder of any such corporation shall make any transfer or assignment of his stock therein to any person in contemplation of its insolvency. Every transfer or assignment or other act done in violation of the foregoing provisions of this section shall be void." It will be seen that the money drawn from the failing bank belonged to the defendant, and the check drawn against the deposit was the check of the defendant. The defendant's president, being also a director in the failing bank, owed certain duties to the defendant and its shareholders and creditors, as well as to the bank, its shareholders and creditors. It is obvious that the judgment of reversal cannot be sustained without holding that the two following propositions are law: (1) That the statute quoted forbids a director in a bank, who has knowledge of its insolvency, from communicating this knowledge to a depositor, even though the depositor happens to be a corporation in which the director is interested, and of which he is president; (2) that the statute forbids a corporation having money on deposit in a bank about to fail from drawing its check against the deposits, on learning that the bank was about to fail, from a director of the bank, who was also president of the corporation and communicated the knowledge to the latter with the intent that it should draw out the money. The language of the statute does not support either of these propositions, and it would be judicial legislation, simply, to hold that they are within the intention and purpose of the law. We must not only produce by judicial construction a new law, but a law which could not have been within the intention of the legislature. The statute is in derogation of the common law, and should not be construed so as to include cases not fairly within its terms. We do not mean to say that it is one of those statutes that must receive a very strict construction, but, when given a fair construction, the plaintiffs can claim nothing more. No one can safely assert that there is any law that requires a director of an insolvent bank, or a bank about to become insolvent, to conceal the fact from anyone. No one can claim that there is any law that forbids a director of such a bank from disclosing the fact to a depositor, even though the depositor should be a corporation in which the bank director is interested, and of which he is president. So long as he confines himself to the truth with respect to the condition of the bank, he violates no law, and is guilty of no moral wrong. Indeed, it is not very difficult to conceive of cases where, in the forum of morals, at least, he would be bound to speak. A bank director, with such knowledge, who would look on and see his neighbors depositing their money where it would be likely to be lost, without giving to them any hint or warning of the danger, might very well be rated as a man whose moral standing was not very high. We may go further, and look at the actual transaction in this case. The defendant's president was a director of the bank. The defendant was dealing with the bank, making deposits of money in large sums, and had then to its credit the entire sum which the plaintiffs seek to recover. Assume that the director of the bank and president of the defendant advised the board of directors of the latter to make no more deposits, as the bank was about to fail; he would not violate any law, but, on the contrary, would be performing a duty which he owed to the defendant, to save it from loss. Such a suggestion would, no doubt, result in a withdrawal of the moneys already deposited, which is all that the plaintiffs complain of; but it would be difficult, if not impossible, to show that under such circumstances any law was violated, or any wrong done. In the present case we must assume that the defendant's president not only advised the withdrawal of the deposit, but signed the check for that purpose, and had it deposited to the defendant's credit in another bank, for the very purpose of having it paid by the bank that was the clearing-house agent of the bank on which it was drawn, and in which he was a director, knowing all the time that it was about to fail. What the statute forbids is that the director shall not, under such circumstances, draw out his own money. The case has been decided in the court below precisely as if such was the fact. Suppose the director of the bank, knowing all about its condition, concealed it from his associate officers and directors in the defendant, and by this course the $50,000 was lost; it might then be difficult to show that the president of the defendant had discharged the duty imposed upon him by his trust to its creditors or shareholders. If the law had not placed some injunction of secrecy upon him with respect to the real condition of the bank, it is very difficult to see how he could be guilty of any legal or moral wrong in participating with the other officers and directors of the defendant in saving it from a great pecuniary loss.

There is no law that forbids a depositor in a bank, who is not an officer or director, from drawing a check against the deposit whenever the money is needed, or even when it is thought the bank is liable to fail. The act by means of which the money was withdrawn in this case was the corporate act of the defendant, and not the individual act of the president. The money on deposit belonged to the defendant, and it was subject to check. The circumstance that the defendant in its corporate capacity was induced to exercise its right by information of the condition of the bank communicated by the president, who was also a director of the bank, cannot change the case, so long as the right to withdraw the money existed. The defendant cannot be compelled to restore the money simply because it made use of knowledge possessed by one of its own officers. In the care and management of its finances, a corporation is entitled to the benefit of all the knowledge upon that subject that any of its officers may possess, and to their best judgment. The act by which the deposit was transferred from the failing bank to the defendant was not in any proper sense the act of the bank or any of its officers or directors. It was not a transfer prohibited by any law. It is true that one of the bank directors participated in it, but not as such director or as an individual, but as an officer of the defendant, acting in its interest. Whatever he did to withdraw the moneys is to be imputed to the defendant, and, of course, is imputed to it by the judgment below. But the question is, Did the defendant, in drawing its check against the deposit, violate any law or perpetrate any wrong? If it did not, then the participation of one of the bank directors in the transaction cannot change the situation. It would, I think, be an unwarranted construction of the statute to hold that a depositor in a bank, who has withdrawn the deposit on learning that the bank was about to close, is liable to be sued for the money, whenever it can be shown that he acted upon information given to him by a director of the bank; and yet the judgment now under review cannot very well be sustained without such a construction, or that in substance.

The learned court below has, I think, recast the statute, and applied it to a state of facts not fairly within it, and to which it was never applied before. The language of the statute is not very concise or clear, and the phraseology is somewhat involved. When carefully read, however, the things that are prohibited may be stated in very few words: (1) It prohibits officers and directors of an insolvent corporation, or of one about to become insolvent, from using their knowledge of its condition, and their dominant position, for their individual benefit, in collecting their own claims, either through a voluntary payment, or through collusive and preferential liens, to the prejudice of other creditors not so favorably situated; (2) it prohibits a preferential general assignment by a corporation, though it does not forbid assignments without preferences; (3) it prohibits a transfer of any of the corporate assets to an officer, director, or stockholder upon any other consideration than the payment of the full value of the property in cash. When we attempt to carry the statute beyond these restrictions, we must rely largely upon speculation with respect to some intent on the part of the lawmakers which is not expressed. It is quite clear, I think, that the statute does not forbid any act disclosed by the facts of this case. The trend of recent decisions of this court has not been in the direction of extending this statute to cases that do not come fairly within its terms. It will be quite sufficient now to refer to two of them. In Jefferson County Nat. Bank v. Townley, 159 N. Y. 490, 54 N. E. 74, we held that an officer or director of an insolvent corporation, while forbidden by the statute from enforcing his claim, as it was in that case, could assign it, and the assignee could enforce it in the same way as any other creditor, and the fact that the assignee was the wife of the officer did not change the case, so long as the assignment was in good faith, and not merely colorable. Much of the reasoning in that case applies to this. In French v. Andrews, 145 N. Y. 441, 40 N. E. 214, a creditor of an insolvent corporation had a large note, not due, and was permitted by the officers of the company to surrender it and take in its place eleven small ones, payable on demand, for the purpose of enabling him to bring suit upon them in a local court. The suits were brought, and judgments recovered by default, and the receiver brought suit to set aside the lien; but this court held that there was no violation of the statute. The defendant in this case was neither an officer, director, nor stockholder of the bank. It was a depositor, merely, and did nothing except withdraw the deposit in order to save itself from loss. The fact that it was moved to do this by a director of the bank, who happened to be its own president, does not bring the case within the statute. The statute, in terms, seems to apply only to corporations "which shall have refused to pay any of its notes or other obligations when due, in lawful money of the United States." It is not claimed that prior to the presentation of the check for the $50,000 at another bank, and its payment, the bank which the plaintiffs represent had refused to pay any of its notes or obligations. There is much difficulty, without such a finding, in applying this statute even to a case where the payment was made to an officer or director, but we prefer to rest our decision upon the larger question already discussed. Neither the bank nor any of its officers or directors made any transfer of the assets to the defendant with a view to give a preference, or in violation of the statute.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and that entered on the report of the referee affirmed, with costs.

1. A premium on bonds paid on investing trust funds the income of which, under a will, is to be paid to testator's daughter for life, with remainder to certain nephews and nieces, cannot be charged to the daughter and the amount thereof deducted from her income, so as to restore the principal of the trust fund in order that it may be turned over unimpaired at the termination of the life estate, where testator has expressly declared his intention to provide for his daughter in the "most bounteous and liberal manner as to expenditure," and obviously intended to devote to her use the entire income of the fund, making the disposition of the principal after her death a secondary consideration.
2. Failure of a life tenant to challenge a deduction of interest, on an annual accounting by a trustee, from her income, does not prevent her from raising the question thereafter as to the distribution of moneys then in the hands of the trustee.

Statement by Bartlett, J.:

Appeal from an order of the appellate division of the supreme court in the first judicial department, entered April 23, 1899, reversing a decree of the surrogate's court of the county of New York, finally judicially settling and allowing the annual accounts of the trustees for Mary Irene Hoyt, under the last will and testament of her father, Jesse Hoyt, deceased. The accounts involved cover the period from the 14th day of August, 1894, to 14th day of August, 1895.

On the 14th day of August, 1882, Jesse Hoyt, a resident of the city of New York, died possessed of a large estate. He left a last will and testament, dated the 26th day of June, 1882, the fourth and eleventh subdivisions of which are particularly involved in this controversy. "Fourth. It is my will, and I hereby direct, that the sum of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be appropriated and received from my estate, real and personal, wheresoever situated, or from the proceeds thereof, by such of my executors hereinafter named as reside or do business in the state of New York, or to whom letters testamentary on this, my will, shall be granted by any surrogate in said state of New York, and as soon as it can or shall be realized or received by such executors and held in trust by them, and the survivors and survivor of them, and their successor or successors to the trust, to and for the use and benefit of my daughter, Mary Irene Hoyt, for and during her natural life; and in the meantime, during such her life, to invest and reinvest, and keep the same invested, and to collect and receive the interest, dividends, and income therefrom, and from each and every part thereof, and to apply to her use, for and during her natural life, in the most bounteous and liberal manner, as to expenditure, and so as to promote her convenience and comfort, and gratify her reasonable desires, the said interest, dividends, and income so to be collected and received, as the same shall be required for her use and benefit. And it is my further will that the said sum of money hereinabove in this article directed to be appropriated and held in trust for and during the natural life of my daughter, Mary Irene, and for her use, as above herein provided, as to the interest, dividends, and income therefrom, or the securities in which the same shall be invested, and any surplus of income therefrom, if any, which shall not have been applied to her use during her natural life, shall, on the death of my said daughter, go and be distributed to and among my nephews and nieces, children of my brothers Alfred M. Hoyt, Reuben Hoyt, and James H. Hoyt, who shall be living at the time of the decease of my said daughter, in equal portions, if all of them shall be living, or if any of them shall have died without leaving issue living at the time of the decease of my said daughter. If any of my said nephews or nieces shall have died, at or before the decease of my said daughter, leaving a child or children living at the time of the decease of my said daughter, then the division is to be made in equal portions between those who shall be living and the child or children of any such deceased nephew or niece, such child or children taking the portion of its or their deceased parent, and in equal portions thereof, if more than one." "Eleventh. I hereby order or direct my said executors hereinabove appointed, and the survivors and survivor of them, to distribute or retain, without a sale, all such stocks or securities as I may have at the time of my decease, which my said executors shall think it expedient to hold, with a view to and in expectation of appreciation, and to distribute or retain any stocks or securities which I may hold at the time of my decease as an investment, which my executors may think it best to retain as a permanent investment, the choicest, and those having longest to run, to be set apart for my wife's use, as hereinabove directed. But my said executors are not to make any new or other investments, excepting only in the first-mortgage bonds and mortgages on unencumbered real estate held in fee simple, or in the public stocks or bonds of the United States, or state stocks or bonds, first-mortgage railroad bonds, and city bonds, in either of which they may make investments in their discretion, having regard to the best interest of my estate. And I hereby vest all the rights and title, power, authority, control, or direction and discretion conferred upon any of my said executors and trustees in the survivors and survivor of them, and in any administrators and administrator with the will annexed, to whom letters may be granted, or to any trustee or trustees who may be appointed by the competent court on the death of my said executors hereinabove named, and the survivors and survivor of them, or on any other contingency by which my said executors, and the survivors and survivor of them, shall become incapable of acting or cease to act."

The other facts in the case appear in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Rand, Jr., with Messrs. Alexander T. Mason and Henry R. Hoyt, for respondents:

The actual income derived from a fund invested in securities purchased at a premium is what the fund earns, remaining itself intact, and not the entire interest received annually from the securities.

So much only of the moneys received annually on bonds purchased at a premium must be treated as income, as, according to computations, the investment is found to produce; the residue belongs to the principal.

It was the intention of Jesse Hoyt to bequeath over to his nephews and nieces, upon the death of Mary Irene Hoyt, the specific sum of $1,250,000, or its equivalent in securities, and to give his daughter during her life no more than the net income actually earned by that sum.

The usual purpose of a testator in providing for a beneficial interest in a trust estate is that the net income only shall be applicable, and that the corpus or capital of the trust estate shall remain intact until the trust shall have determined.

Re Albertson, 113 N. Y. 434, 21 N. E. 117; Reynal v. Thebaud, 54 N. Y. S. R. 144, 23 N. Y. Supp. 615; New York Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Kane, 17 App. Div. 542, 45 N. Y. Supp. 543.

The trustees were authorized to establish and maintain the sinking fund, and to make the reservations of interest.

It is the duty of the trustees to keep the corpus of the trust fund intact as far as possible, and for this purpose they have the right to establish and maintain a sinking fund from that portion of the moneys received by them annually on securities purchased at a premium, which is not annual income earned by the investment, to make good the premiums paid for such securities, and to cover the deficiency in the principal of the trust fund, which will necessarily occur when the securities are paid off at their maturity.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question submitted for our determination relates to the premium on bonds in which the trust estate has been invested. It is insisted on behalf of the appellant, Mary Irene Hoyt, that she is entitled to the entire income earned by the trust fund. The trustees claim that there should be deducted from this income a certain sum each year to meet the "wearing away" of the premium as the bonds approach the date of falling due, in order that the remaindermen may be protected, and the principal of the trust fund turned over to them, at the falling in of the life estate, unimpaired. This matter was originally sent to a referee, who decided in favor of the trustees. The surrogate's court of the county of New York reversed this decision, holding in favor of the life tenant. The appellate division reversed the decree of the surrogate's court.

In order to determine the question presented by this appeal, it is necessary to consider the facts surrounding the execution of the will. The testator was a man of very large wealth, estimated at from six to eight millions of dollars, nearly the entire amount of which he bequeathed to his brothers and their children. For some reason that is not disclosed by this record, but which we must assume was sufficient, the testator made a very peculiar will, so far as his only child and daughter was concerned. By the fourth clause thereof he directed that the sum of $1,250,000 should be appropriated from his estate and held in trust for the use and benefit of his daughter during her life. The trustees were directed to collect and receive the interest, dividends, and income therefrom, and from each and every part thereof, and to apply to her use, for and during her natural life, in the most bounteous and liberal manner as to expenditure, and so as to promote her convenience and comfort and gratify her reasonable desires. The testator further provided that the principal sum, or the securities in which the same shall be invested, and any surplus of income therefrom, should, upon his daughter's death, go to certain nephews and nieces. It will thus be observed that the daughter, while entitled to receive the interest upon a very considerable sum in order to meet most lavish annual expenses, was not given outright any portion of the millions constituting her father's estate. In the light of these facts, we are called upon to determine the intention of the testator when drafting the fourth clause of his will.

It is insisted by the trustees that it was the intention of Jesse Hoyt to bequeath over to his nephews and nieces, upon the death of Mary Irene Hoyt, the specific sum of $1,250,000, or its equivalent in securities, and to give his daughter during her life no more than the net income actually earned by that sum. It is urged by the daughter's counsel that not only was it testator's intention to give the entire income, but that, in case of doubt or ambiguity the law presumes in favor of the child as against the claims of collateral relatives; or, in other words, that, if the probabilities and indications are equal on each side as against the other, the just inclination of the courts will favor the child. By the eleventh subdivision of the will, the testator directed his executors to distribute or retain, without a sale, all such stocks or securities as he might have at the time of his decease, which they thought expedient to hold, but that they should not make any new or other investments, excepting only in first-mortgage bonds and mortgages on unencumbered real estate, or in the public stocks or bonds of the United States, or state stocks or bonds, first-mortgage railroad bonds, and city bonds. In creating this trust fund for the daughter, it appears that the trustees decided not to set apart any of the securities held by the testator at the time of his decease, but took the sum of $1,250,000 in cash, and invested it chiefly in government 4 per cent bonds and railroad bonds at a high premium. This premium in two purchases reached 29 per cent for the government bonds, and 33½ per cent for some of the railroad bonds. The result was that nearly $245,000 was absorbed by the premium. The trustees decided that the life tenant ought to bear the entire loss thus imposed upon the fund, and, under expert computation, have kept back annually from the income the sum of $8,039 as a sinking fund to make good the premium that will have worn away when the bonds fall due.

The courts of our own state, of other states, and of England have discussed this question in various phases as to the rights of the life tenant and the remainderman, and some of the decisions are conflicting, and not to be reconciled. This court, in the recent case of McLouth v. Hunt, 154 N. Y. 179, 39 L. R. A. 230, 48 N. E. 548, had occasion to examine this question in one aspect of it, Judge O'Brien writing the opinion. Hethen said: "Notwithstanding the conflict of authority to which I have referred, there is one principle or rule applicable to this case, with respect to which the parties are all at agreement, and that is that the questions are not to be determined by any arbitrary rule, but by ascertaining, when that can be done, the meaning and intention of the testatrix, to be derived from the language employed in the creation of the trust, from the relations of the parties to each other, their condition, and all the surrounding facts and circumstances of the case."

In considering the surrounding facts and circumstances in the case at bar, to which we have already alluded, it is reasonable to infer that the testator intended in this sole provision for his daughter that she should receive, as he expressed it in the fourth subdivision of the will, "the interest, dividends, and income therefrom, and from each and every part thereof," referring to the trust fund. He expresses his desire, in clear and unmistakable language, to provide for her in the "most bounteous and liberal manner as to expenditure, and so as to promote her convenience and comfort and gratify her reasonable desires." He directs that upon the death of his daughter all moneys set apart for her use, "or the securities in which the same shall be invested," shall be disposed of in a certain manner.

It seems quite apparent that the testator contemplated that the trust fund, or a portion of it, might be loaned out on bond and mortgage, and thus not lose its identity as a cash sum; while, on the other hand, a part of it might be placed in securities at a premium, in which event the remaindermen were to take the fund as invested. It is fair to assume that the testator, who was a man of rare business sagacity, understood all the details of investing large sums of money, and that, if he had intended to impose upon the income of his daughter's trust fund the burden of the high premium incident to the class of securities to which he restricted his trustees, he would have expressed himself in clear language to that effect. It seems to us very obvious that the testator intended to devote to his daughter's use the entire income of the fund which he set apart for that purpose, if necessary, and that the disposition of the principal after her death was a secondary consideration. The remaindermen, nephews, and nieces were made very wealthy by other provisions of the will. If it proved necessary to promote his daughter's convenience and comfort and gratify her reasonable desires, the testator seems to have employed language that cannot be misconstrued in this connection, and dedicated the entire income to that purpose. It is true that he has provided that, if there should be any surplus of the income, it, together with the moneys constituting the trust fund, or the securities in which the same shall be invested, are to be disposed of in a certain manner. It seems quite impossible, in giving to the language of the fourth subdivision of the will its plain and ordinary meaning, to spell out an intention on the part of the testator to provide a sinking fund, to be deducted from the income, in order to make good the premium paid in purchasing the securities. The testator evidently regarded a surplus of income as a mere possibility, and, as a matter of precaution, provided for the disposition of the same. He also seemed to anticipate that the principal of the trust fund would pass to the residuary legatees either as money or its equivalent, or in the form of investment then existing. There is no language, fairly construed, that can be considered as imposing upon the trustees the duty of turning over to nephews and nieces the full sum of $1,250,000 in cash or its equivalent.

The argument of the trustees seems to go to this extent: That if they had seen fit to constitute a trust fund for the daughter out of the investments held by the testator at the time of his death, or to have invested cash in the form of specific mortgage investment on real estate, where it would not lose its identity, the income of the daughter would be subjected to no diminution on account of premium; but if they chose to take the entire trust fund in cash, and invest it, as they actually did, it would be subjected to a loss of $8,000 and more a year. If we are right in the conclusion reached, that it was the intention of the testator to impose the loss of premium upon the remaindermen, the question of conflict of authority in the cases cited in the briefs here and the opinion below is unimportant.

As we have before pointed out, the decision in the McLouth Case, 154 N. Y. 179, 39 L. R. A. 230, 48 N. E. 548, rested wholly upon the intention of the testator, as derived from the face of the will and the surrounding circumstances. We take the same course in the case before us, and decide it upon the special facts presented. The appellate division placed their decision upon the intention of the testator, and reached a conclusion contrary to that which has been arrived at by this court. In the case at bar the loss involved in the payment of this heavy premium is necessarily apportioned between the life tenant and the remaindermen to this extent: The life tenant, for a long series of years, receives interest on a largely reduced principal sum, and the remainderman at the end of that period loses the amount of the premium paid. This loss of the remainderman may, however, be reduced if the life estate falls in before the bonds mature, and while they are still quoted at a large premium. The manner in which the loss shall be borne, occasioned by the payment of premiums on investing the principal of a trust fund, in the absence of any expressed intention of the testator, is a question not presented by this record, and we refrain from discussing it.

An additional point is taken by the respondents to the effect that, in several annual accountings prior to the one now before the court, the testator's daughter allowed the reservation of a portion of the interest money by the trustees to make good the amount paid from the principal trust fund for premium to pass unchallenged, and consequently the decrees therein are res judicata in this proceeding, and prevent her from raising the question at this time. We are of opinion that this point is not well taken. The decrees in the former accountings are binding upon the daughter of the testator as to the amounts therein involved, and will not be affected by our decision herein, but this does not prevent her from raising the question now as to the distribution of the money in the hands of the trustees. Bouditch v. Ayrault, 138 N. Y. 222, 231, 34 N. E. 514.

The order of the Appellate Division appealed from should be reversed, and the decree of the surrogate's court of the county of New York affirmed, with costs to the appellant in all the courts.

All concur, except Parker, Ch. J., and Gray and Haigh, JJ., dissenting.

of judicial power, and the judgment conclusive as to all matters properly cognizant in the probate proceedings, and as to the property covered by the will, is, so far as regards personality, within the provision of the United States Constitution requiring full faith and credit to be given in each state to the judicial proceedings of every other state.

even as against persons not made parties to the proceeding.

2. Courts will not refuse to give effect to statutes providing for the recording of foreign wills, and giving them the same effect as if made and proved in the state, because such effect is not given to foreign wills by the state from which the record comes.

3. That promissory notes bequeathed by will are secured by mortgage on real estate does not deprive them of the character of personal property so as to prevent their passing by a foreign will duly probated at testator's domicile, and recorded in the state where the land is situated, as provided by the laws of the latter state.

(April Term, 1899.)

APPPEAL by contestants from a decree of the Probate Court for Shelby County refusing to certify to the Circuit Court pro-

I. As to personal property.

In MARTIN v. STOVALL, where a testator was domiciled in Mississippi, and his will was duly probated there, and an authenticated copy of the proceedings recorded in Tennessee, and an heir brought an action to contest the same in Tennessee, the petition was dismissed. It was held that the action of the probate court in Mississippi was final and conclusive as to personal property, and was a judicial proceeding under U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1, providing that full faith and credit, etc. Miss. Const. § 159, giving chancery courts jurisdiction of matters testamentary, and Miss. Code, § 1813, providing for probating wills in the chancery court in the county in which the testator resided, have been construed to the effect that the probate of a will is an exercise of the judicial power. Miss. Code 1892, § 1821, provides that all parties interested shall be made parties, and those made parties will be concluded, and § 1822 provides that if not contested within two years the probate will be conclusive. The court said: "Again, probate proceedings are proceedings in rem," and the judgments bind all persons, whether parties in the record or not;" and that the probate could not be opened under Shannon's Tenn. Code, §§ 8916-3918, providing for recording wills upon authenticated copies.

This decision is in accord with the general rule that a decree of probate from another state where the testator was domiciled is conclusive in regard to personal property. As to "full faith and credit," etc., see that subdivision.

A will of personal property must be valid by the law of the testator's domicile, to be effective. Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286; Brock v. Frank, 51 Ala. 85; Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13; St. James's Church v. Walker, 1 Del. Ch. 284; Latine v. Clements, 3 Ga. 426; Knight v. Wheedon, 104 Ga. 300, 30 S. E. 794; Alexander's Will, 1 Tucker, 114 (see N. Y. Code, subd. Classification by States—New York); Manuel v. Manuel, 18 Ohio St. 458; Holman v. Hopkins, 27 Tex. 38; Ford v. Ford, 70 Wis. 19, 33 N. W. 188.

So, a decree of probate from another state is of no force as to personality if the testator's domicile is here. Sturdivant v. Neill, 27 Miss. 157; Wells v. Wells, 35 Miss. 638; Wallace v. Wallace, 3 N. J. Eq. 618.

And such decree is of no effect if the will is not made according to the law of this state, and the domicile is here. Nat v. Coons, 10 Mo. 343; Stewart v. Pettus, 10 Mo. 755.

ceedings resulting in the filing of the will of Ferreba A. Hall, which had been probated in the state of Mississippi, in order to give petitioners an opportunity to contest the will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pierson & Ewing for appellants.
Mr. J. M. Gregory for appellee.

McFarland, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case involves the question whether a will executed and probated in another state, where the testatrix was domiciled, and afterwards certified under the act of Congress, and filed and recorded in this state, is subject to the contest here, under our statute. Mrs. Ferreba A. Hall died during the month of August, 1898, in Coahoma county, Mississippi, where she was domiciled, leaving what

And a decree of probate in another state is not effective until filed and recorded in the probate court of this state. Olney v. Angell, 5 R. I. 198, 73 Am. Dec. 62.

In Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286, it was said: "Our statute, which provides for the probate in our courts of authenticated copies of foreign wills which have been proved according to the laws of any of the United States, or of any country out of the limits of the United States, was not designed to deny to our courts jurisdiction over the probate of the original will made in a foreign country, but disposing of property situated here. It but enlarges the jurisdiction of the court, enabling the parties to make the contest upon an authenticated copy of a foreign will, proved according to the law of the domicile, in the same manner they might have done upon the original."

In Brock v. Frank, 51 Ala. 85, it was said that Ala. Stat. 1806, Clay's Dig. 598, § 12, providing for the probate in this state of wills proved in other states, and providing that such wills shall be liable to be contested and controverted in the same manner as the original might have been, was construed in Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286, as enlarging the jurisdiction of Alabama courts of probate so as to contest a will of a testator domiciled abroad; but this provision was omitted from the Code although providing for its probate.

A will of personal property, made in Pennsylvania, although the property may be in Delaware, must operate according to the laws of Pennsylvania. But the probate of a nuncupative will in Pennsylvania is not sufficient to give it any effect in Delaware, and until probate is made in that state the will cannot be considered to pass any property there. St. James's Church v. Walker, 1 Del. Ch. 284. In this case the court said that upon the principle that personal property must follow the domicile of the testator, if this will was made according to the laws of the state in which the testator was domiciled at his decease, even though all the formalities required by our act of assembly were not observed, it is sufficient to pass personal estate; but in order to give it effect, the probate must be made in New Castle county where such property is situated, not, indeed, according to the requisites of our statute, but according to the proof required by the law of the domicile of the testator.

Where a testator domiciled in Ohio made a will of personality in the olographic form in Louisiana, valid in that state, while he was there for business purposes, and died in Ohio, purported to be a last will and testament, which was duly probated in common form as such on the 22d day of August, 1898, in the chancery court of Coahoma county, Mississippi. The defendant, William H. Stovall, was named as the executor of said will, and on September 7, 1898, he filed the same in the probate court of Shelby county, Tennessee, for record, and the same was ordered filed, and letters of administration were by said court ordered to be issued to him as executor. On October 19, 1898, Hugh Martin and wife, Sallie C. Martin, R. J. Cook, a minor, suing by his next friend, Hugh Martin, Paul Cook, Walter Cotter, and his wife Mary Cotter, filed their original petition in said probate court of Shelby county, Tennessee, in which they set out the facts hereinbefore stated in reference to the alleged will of Mrs. Ferreba A. Hall, and further stated that they were the only heirs at law and distributees of the said Mrs. Hall, and, as such, entitled, in the absence of a will, to the whole of her estate, under the laws of the states of Tennessee and Mississippi. It further alleged that the paper purporting to be the last will and testament as aforesaid was not valid, because Mrs. Hall, at the time of the alleged execution thereof, was insane, and, by reason of said insanity, incapable of making a will, and that she was unduly influenced to make said will by the said William H. Stovall, who is named as executor therein, and by Mary Ann Sparks and her husband, J. H. Sparks, acting in collusion with said William H. Stovall. The petition prayed that the said paper alleged to be the last will and testament of Mrs. Hall be certified, as by law provided, to the circuit court of Shelby county, where the same might be contested as the law an authenticated copy of the will and probate in Louisiana should not have been admitted to record in Ohio as a will of personality. In order to be valid, it should have been executed according to the laws of the testator's domicile at the time of his death. It was held that Ohio act 1840, § 28, providing that authenticated copies of wills executed and proved according to the laws of any state relative to any property in this state may be admitted to record in any county where any property is situated, and authenticated copies so recorded shall have the same validity as wills made in this state in conformity to the laws thereof are declared to have, did not authorize the record of such will. Manuel v. Manuel, 13 Ohio St. 458.

And the validity of a bequest or disposition of personal property by last will and testament must be governed by the law of the testator's domicile at the time of his death, and this includes, not only the form and mode of the execution of the will, but also the lawful power and authority of the testator to make such disposition. Ford v. Ford, 70 Wis. 19, 33 N. W. 188.

And under N. J. act March 6, 1828, Harrison, 195, authorizing the granting of letters testamentary, on certificate of probate of foreign wills, and giving them the same effect as if the will had been proved by the subscribing witnesses in the usual manner under the laws of this state, a will made in New Jersey, where the testator lived at the time of his death, cannot be probated here on a probate made in Pennsylvania, as the act has reference to foreign wills only. Wallace v. Wallace, 8 N. J. Eq. 618. In this case the court said: "If the will were a will of personality, where would be the opportunity of contesting it or examining into the sanity of the testator? And, even if it were a will of lands, the privilege of contestation in the civil-law courts would be taken away. It is no answer to say that cases of fraud or collusion might be inquired into."

And a testamentary disposition of movable property must, to be valid anywhere, be made according to the local law of the testator's domicile at the time of his death. Barnes v. Brahear, 2 B. Mon. 380.

In Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13, it was said that Clay's (Ala.) Dig. 598, § 12, which was the law prior to 1852, providing that the validity of a will probated in other states was subject to be contested and controverted as the original might have been, manifestly modified the general principle of law applicable to the probate of wills of personal property, that the sentence of a tribunal of competent jurisdiction is binding and conclusive everywhere.

A decree of probate from another state is not open to contest where a will of personal property is probated at the domicile. MARTIN v. STOVALL; Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60; Nelson v. Potter, 50 N. J. L. 324, 15 Atl. 375; Alexander's Will, 1 Tucker, 114; Dickey v. Vann, 81 Ala. 425, 8 So. 195; Helme v. Sanders, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 566.

And where the court in another state had jurisdiction of the probate of a will of real or personal property, such probate is a judgment in rem, and, in the absence of statutory provisions, is conclusive in Alabama as to the capacity of the testator and the due execution and validity of the will. Brock v. Frank, 51 Ala. 89.

So in regard to personal property. Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13.

Where a duly certified copy of a will probated in Pennsylvania is offered for record in the county court of Tennessee, it is not necessary to prove the same as an original will in the state of Tennessee as a will of personal property, and it is error to refuse to admit the certified copy to record. Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60.

This is on the ground that Tenn. Code, §§ 2182-2185, providing that where any foreign will has been proved according to the laws of this state in a court of the United States, any person interested may present a copy duly authenticated to the county court of any county in the state where the land or estate disposed of by will is situated, and thereupon such court may order the same to be filed and recorded, and said copy, when so recorded, shall have the same force and effect as if the original had been executed, proved, and allowed in this state; and § 2190, providing that persons interested to contest the validity of such will may do so in the same manner as though it had been originally presented for probate in said court,—were construed to mean that so far as the will disposes of personal property the probate court of the domicile of the testatrix has the exclusive jurisdiction to decide upon the validity or invalidity as a will of personal property, and as such it is not open for contest in the courts of Tennessee. The right to contest the validity of wills probated in a foreign state is limited to wills of real or immovable property. It is further held that where the county judge in Tennessee found all the facts necessary to a judgment or decree, that the entering up of the judgment ordering the probate to record was min-directa. William H. Stovall, the executor named in said will, appeared by his attorney, and moved to dismiss the said petition, assigning as the ground thereof, stated in various forms, that it was not shown in said petition that the alleged testatrix died seised and possessed of any real estate in the state of Tennessee, and that the probate of the will in the place of the domicile of the testatrix was valid, binding, and conclusive upon all parties until set aside in the court where the original probate was had. Thereupon the original petitioners, having obtained leave of the court, on December 20, 1898, filed their amended petition, wherein they repeat the allegation of the original petition; and further set forth that the said Mrs. Ferreba A. Hall, at the time of her death, was the owner of mortgages upon real estate situated in Shelby county, Tennessee, for the sum of $5,000, said mortgages having been originally made to her husband James S. Hall, and having been devised by him to his said widow, and that by her said alleged will Mrs. Hall attempted to dispose of the said mortgages and the title to the said real estate. The executor moved to dismiss the amended petition upon the same ground as that for dismissing the original petition, and upon the additional ground that, said will of Mrs. Hall having been probated in the chancery court of Coahoma county, Mississippi, the place of the domicile of the testatrix, said action of the court in so admitting said will to probate was final and conclusive, under § 1 of art. 4 of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state." The court

So, if a will bequeathing personalty is executed according to the laws of the state where the testator resided, it is a sufficient bequest of such personalty, although it may not conform to the laws of the state where the personalty is situated. Knight v. Wheedon, 104 Ga. 309, 30 S. E. 794.

In Montgomery v. Millikin, 5 Smedes & M. 151, 43 Am. Dec. 507, a will was made and probated in Kentucky, and proved and certified to the proper court in Louisiana, where the testator was domiciled, and it was held in Mississippi that the probate was valid under La. Civ. Code, art. 1589, providing that a will is valid if executed according to the laws of the place where it was made.

In Morris v. Morris, 27 Miss. 847, it was said that in the case of Montgomery v. Millikin, 5 Smedes & M. 151, 43 Am. Dec. 507, the law of Louisiana provided that the will should be valid if it conformed to the law of the place where it was made, and that this law was an exception to the general rule, and the only question necessary to be decided was whether the will was valid and had been so established by the proper court in Louisiana. "The judgment of the court in that state would be conclusive on that subject, and was all that our courts would require in regard to the personal estate." And the court said that the question in that case, in regard to the sale of lots in Mississippi, received no other consideration than that the sale by the administrator with the will annexed was valid.

A contest on probate as to domicile of testator concludes the parties thereto when the record is offered in another state to obtain revocation of letters of administration. Thomas v. Morrisett, 76 Ga. 384.

II. Wills of real estate.

The general rule is that a will, in order to affect real estate, must conform, in its execution and proof of the same, to the law of the place where the land is situated. Robertson v. Pickrell, 100 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407; Blount v. Walker, 134 U. S. 607, 33 L. ed. 1036, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606; Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286; *Goodman v. In the absence of statute, some cases hold that a decree of another state admitting a will to probate is of no effect as to real estate. Robertson v. Pickrell, 100 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407; McCormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. 192, 6 L. ed. 300; Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. 465, 6 L. ed. 367; Apperson v. Bolton, 29 Ark. 418; Smith v. Shackelford, 9 Dana, 452; Budd v. Brooke, 3 Gill, 198, 48 Am. Dec. 821.

And the will has no effect until proved and allowed in this state. Pott v. Pennington, 16 Minn. 509, Gil. 460.

The probate from another state is of no effect if the will is revoked by the birth of a child. Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 460, 22 Am. Dec. 41.

And such probate is of no effect if the will is not proved according to the law of the place where the real estate is situated. Cornellson v. Browning, 10 B. Mon. 425; *Knight v. And is of no effect until proved or allowed for record. Graves v. Ewart, 99 Mo. 13, 11 S. W. 971; Van Syckel v. Beam, 110 Mo. 589, 19 S. W. 946.

In order that a will probated in one state may be probated in another as to real estate, it must be shown that its execution complies with the laws of the state where the land is situated. Dublin v. Chadbourne, 16 Mass. 433; Key v. Harlan, 52 Ga. 476; Williams v. Jones, 14 dismissed the original and amended petitions at the cost of the petitioners, and denied to said petitioners any relief. Said petitioners have sued out a writ of error from this court to said probate court of Shelby county, Tennessee, to review and reverse the said decree of the probate court of Shelby county dismissing their petition.

The first question presented by the contention of the executor is that the action of the chancery court of Coahoma county, Mississippi, was final and conclusive, under § 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, which decrees that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state." It is submitted, in support of this contention, that the Constitution of the state of Mississippi gives the chancery court jurisdiction of all matters testamentary and of administration, under § 159, Miss. Const.; that § 482 of the Annotated Code of Mississippi carries that constitutional provision into effect; and that, by § 1813, of the Code of Mississippi, wills shall be probated in, and letters testamentary granted by, the chancery court of the county in which the testator had fixed his place of residence. In the construction of these sections of the Code, it has been held that a probate of will is the exercise of a judicial power, and the testament cannot be admitted of record until probated. Fotherlee v. Lawrence, 30 Miss. 416. Section 1821, Miss. Code 1892, provides that all parties interested may be made parties, and those made parties are concluded. Section 1822 gives two years to contest probate, and, if not contested within that time, it is conclusive. Schlottman v. Hoffman, 73 Miss. 188, 18 So.

Bush, 418; Bailey v. Bailey, 8 Ohio, 239; Jones v. Robinson, 17 Ohio St. 171; Ex parte Povall, 3 Leigh, 816; Thrasher v. Ballard, 33 W. Va. 285, 10 S. E. 411.

And the validity of a will may be contested where the land is situated, although probated in another state. Pennel v. Weyant, 2 Harr. (Del.) 501.

And an action may be maintained to set aside the probate of a will coming from another state if invalid as to real estate. Lynch v. Miller, 54 Iowa, 516, 6 N. W. 740.

The same was said to be the rule in Otto v. Doty, 61 Iowa, 23, 15 N. W. 578.

Where a will probated in another state is presented for record to the probate court in the state in which realty is situated, and such court upon the evidence finds that the authentication of the copy is sufficient, its adjudication cannot be collaterally attacked. Calloway v. Cooley, 50 Kan. 743, 32 Pac. 372.

Where a will probated in another state is admitted to probate as a will of real estate by a county court upon a copy and a certificate of probate, the order of the county court is conclusive, except as to the jurisdiction of the court, until the same is superseded, reversed, or annulled, the same as in case of a domestic will; and the fact that the copy does not show upon what proof the will was admitted to probate by the foreign court does not render the order of the county court void. Whalen v. Nisbet, 95 Ky. 464, 26 S. W. 188. In this case it was proved that the statute where the will was probated prescribed the same requisites of a valid will as are prescribed in Kentucky for a will of realty.

A will made in New York and probated there, and attested by two witnesses, will be a valid disposition of real property in Maine if the proceedings are recorded there, under Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 12, providing that a will executed in another state, according to the laws thereof, may be presented for probate in this state, and § 13, providing that a will proved and allowed in another state, according to the laws thereof, may be allowed and recorded in this state, and a copy of the will and the probate duly authenticated shall be produced by the executor to the judge of probate in any county in which there is estate, real or personal, and, after hearing, the judge may order the copy to be filed and recorded, and § 14, providing that such will shall then have the same force and effect as if originally proved and allowed in the same court. Lyon v. Ogden, 85 Me. 374, 27 Atl. 258. In this case the will, 48 L. R. A.

if made and probated in Maine, would not have been valid, as three subscribing witnesses are required in Maine.

It was the intention to give all wills executed out of the state, according to the formalities required by the law of the place where executed, and whether of real or personal estate, the force and effect of domestic wills to pass all property situate in this state, under Conn. Stat. of Wills 1856, chap. 44, act of 1863, chap. 7, providing that wills devising real estate executed out of this state, according to the laws of the state where executed, shall be as effectual to pass property as though executed according to the laws of this state. Irwin's Appeal, 33 Conn. 128.

And a decree of the probate court in New Hampshire allowing and proving a will, and a subsequent decree of the probate court of Massachusetts allowing a copy of the will with the probate thereof in New Hampshire to be filed and recorded, operate as final and conclusive upon all persons as to all questions of the validity, including that of the capacity of a married woman to make a will. Parker v. Parker, 11 Cush. 519. In this case it was held that the decree of the court of probate approving the will of a married woman is conclusive upon the heirs, and they cannot, in a court of common law, deny the legal capacity of the testatrix. The opinion does not clearly show whether the decree referred to was the decree of the original probate or the decree of the Massachusetts court admitting such record to probate.

Where an executor presented two wills for probate in New York, where the testatrix died, having real estate in Massachusetts, and the earlier will was allowed and the other rejected, the probate court of Massachusetts had no authority to require the executor to produce the rejected will. Loring v. Oakley, 98 Mass. 267. In this case the court said: "There is much difficulty in determining whether the will sustained and probated in the domicile of the testatrix can be here set aside in favor of one of later date already disallowed there; and whether the latter will, if admissible to probate here for any purpose, should be allowed to operate upon real estate in Massachusetts only, or also upon personalty in this jurisdiction."

In Crusoe v. Butler, 36 Miss. 150, it was held that the will of one domiciled in Alabama, and purporting to have been attested by three witnesses, and which had been duly proved in Alabama, was properly admitted to probate in Mississippi, and was effectual as to lands lying in this state, although the authenticated copy

893. Section 1824: If after probate an issue of devisavit is made on trial the probate is good. In the probate of a will in Mississippi, some direct proof that the testator was of sound and disposing mind must be given on the probate of a will even in common form. Martin v. Perkins, 56 Miss. 204. Where a writing has been probated in common form as a will, it must be treated as the established will of deceased, and in full force and effect, until overthrown in a direct proceeding. Tucker v. Whitehead, 58 Miss. 762. It is also held that, where a chancery court is given special jurisdiction as in probate proceedings, the manner of exercising this jurisdiction does not affect its conclusiveness. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. pt. 1, chap. 1.

It would seem, therefore, that, under these constitutional and Code provisions, the admission to probate of a will in Mississippi is the exercise of a judicial power, and its judgment thereon conclusive in Mississippi as to all matters properly cognizant in the probate proceedings and as against all parties properly before the court in the proceedings, and also, as a proceeding in rem, conclusive as to the property covered by the will itself. The question, then, is, When this will is offered and probated in the state of Tennessee, and the personal property actually and constructively in Mississippi, what effect shall be given to this judicial proceeding in the state of Mississippi? The transmission of property by will is in many important particulars different from the transmission of title by deed or other proceedings. The power to dispose of property by will, says Judge Gray in Brettun v. Fox, 100 Mass. 234, is not a natural nor constitutional right, but depends wholly upon the statute, and may be from Alabama showed that the will had been proved there by but one of the three subscribing witnesses. This decision was placed on two grounds: (1) As the record stated that the will was duly proved by one witness and was admitted to probate, and it did not affirmatively appear that that witness proved only the attestation by himself and execution in his presence, it will be presumed that he testified to every fact necessary to due execution; (2) the copy of the will had been ordered to be admitted to probate and recorded in the probate court of L. county, and that act was unassailable collaterally.

And an exemplified copy of a will made and probated in another state and proofs thereof, when recorded, are equivalent to the proof of a will under N. Y. Laws 1864, chap. 311, amended by Laws 1872, chap. 680, providing that when any real estate within this state shall be devised by any person residing within any other state, and a will shall have been admitted to probate in this state and recorded where admitted to probate, an exemplified copy may be recorded in the surrogate's office in this state, where the real estate is situated, which record, or a copy thereof, shall be presumptive evidence of said will, and of the due execution thereof. Bromley v. Miller, 2 Thomp. & C. 575.

The probate of a will was held sufficient to pass the title to real property where it was probated in Mississippi and an authenticated copy filed and recorded in North Carolina, and the record of the Mississippi court was properly certified, and showed that the will was subscribed by two witnesses; that the witnesses subscribed in the presence of the testator and at his request; that the testator at the time of signing the will was of sound and disposing memory; and that he was over twenty-one years of age; although the examination of witnesses to the will was signed and certified by the clerk separately from the certificate of probate made by the clerk. It was held that this complied sufficiently with N. C. Code, § 2149, providing that the certificate of probate shall embody the substance of proof and examination. Roscoe v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. 124 N. C. 42, 32 S. E. 389.

And a foreign will proved according to the laws of Tennessee, as required by Tenn. Code, § 2182, is sufficient to pass lands and other estate in Tennessee, under Tenn. Code, § 2185. Smith v. Neilson, 13 Lea, 461.

And a will duly probated in another state, and executed according to the law of Tennessee, is operative as a conveyance of lands without registration there. Bleldorn v. Pilot Mountain Coal & Min. Co. 89 Tenn. 166, 15 S. W. 737.

The courts of Virginia are not restrained from probating a will by which lands lying in that state are devised, so far as the title of lands may be affected, although the same will may have been declared void by a court in North Carolina, on account of incapacity of the testator, or for any cause whatever. Rice v. Jones, 4 Call. (Va.) 89.

In Swift v. Wiley, 1 B. Mon. 114, a will was made and probated in Missouri affecting land in Kentucky, and a suit was filed in the chancery court of Kentucky where the real estate was situated, charging fraud in the execution, and denying that it was published according to the laws of that state, and prayed for a partition and distribution of the realty, and after the institution of the suit the document was recorded in the clerk's office of the court of appeals according to the provisions of Ky. act 1820 (Statute Laws, 1548). It was held that the attestation of the will was sufficient under the laws of Kentucky, and there was no proof of fraud in the execution.

The distinction is usually made, in regard to domicile, that the term is used in regard to wills of personal property, and they must be executed according to the law of the domicile, and wills in regard to real estate, in the absence of statute, must be executed in compliance with the law of the state where the land is situated. But, in Mississippi, while this distinction in some cases is noted, the decisions are on the theory that if the domicile is in Mississippi the will must be probated there, either of personalty or realty, and not upon the usual ground that the will must be proved according to the law of the place where the real estate is situated. So, in Bate v. Incles, 59 Miss. 513, it was held that a certificate of probate from Tennessee of a will whose maker was domiciled in Mississippi could not be probated in that state, although the testatrix died in the other state having property there. In this case the property in contest was real estate, and it was held that Miss. Code 1871, § 1105, providing that authenticated copies of wills proved according to the law of the states may be admitted to probate in Mississippi, did not apply to wills made by citizens domiciled in this state.

The same was held in Sturdivant v. Neill, 27 Miss. 157, and Morris v. Morris, 27 Miss. 847.

In Wells v. Wells, 35 Miss. 638, it was held that the probate in Louisiana of the will of a testator who died there, and whose domicile was conferred, taken away, or limited and regulated, in whole or in part, by legislature; "and whatever theory we adopt," says the American edition of Jarman on Wills, "as to the origin of wills, and of the law that governs them, they have become, as regards their execution and probate wholly, and as regards their construction largely, the creatures of statutory law." 3 Jarman, Wills, 721. What law governs where there is a conflict of laws, as between the statutory provisions of the several states, is the prime question always to be determined. As to the testamentary capacity and form and manner of execution, in case of personalty, the law of the testator's domicile governs. Story, Conf. L. §§ 51, 61, 465; Wharton, Conf. L. § 569; Roberts, Wills, p. 525; Jacob, Domicil, § 45. As to real property, it is claimed by many that the same rule applies, under the civil law, as to personalty, but by the common law it is governed by the lex loci rei sitæ. Story, Conf. L. § 431; Wharton, Conf. L. § 469. This court in the case of Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60, which will be referred to hereafter, says: "It may be therefore said, as a rule of law alike applicable in this country and in England, that the lex loci rei sitæ governs in cases of immovable or real property, and the lex domicilii in cases of movable or personal property." The reason for this rule seems to be that, as to personal property, it follows the person of the owner wherever situated,—is to be governed by the laws of the domicile of the owner; and this rule applies to all questions of disposition by will as well as other means of disposition. Again, probate proceedings "are proceedings in rem," and the judgments bind all persons, whether parties in the record or not. Pat-

in Mississippi, was valid as to his property situated in Louisiana.

In Crusoe v. Butler, 36 Miss. 150, it was held that a will of one domiciled in Alabama, and purporting to have been attested by three witnesses and duly proved in Alabama, was properly admitted to probate in Mississippi, and was effectual as to land there, although the copy from Alabama showed that the will was proved there by but one of the witnesses. This decision was on the ground that, as it did not affirmatively appear that the witness proved only the attestation by himself, it will be presumed that he testified to every fact necessary, and second, that as the copy had been admitted to probate and recorded in this state, that act is not assailable collaterally.

III. Presumption.

The decree of another state probating a will is presumed to be correct, and it will be presumed that the court had jurisdiction. Houze v. Houze, 16 Tex. 598.

And such decree is presumed to be regular. Otto v. Doty, 61 Iowa, 23, 15 N. W. 578.

And the decree will be presumed to have been properly allowed. Crusoe v. Butler, 36 Miss. 150.

If a decree of another state probating a will is allowed for record on insufficient evidence, it will be presumed to have been probated for personalty only. Dupoyater v. Gagan, 84 Ky. 403, 1 S. W. 652.

So, a decree probating a will in another state is presumed valid as a will of personalty. (Stat.) Williams v. Jones, 14 Bush, 418.

In Bowen v. Johnson, 5 R. I. 112, 73 Am. Dec. 49, it was held that a decree of another state was only prima facie evidence of the validity of a will.

IV. As to full faith and credit.

There seems to be a conflict of authority as to the effect on a probate of a will in another state in regard to U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1, and act of Congress, May 10, 1790, providing that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the records and judicial proceedings of every other state, some cases holding that a probate of a will is a judicial proceeding entitled to full faith, etc., in other states. Some cases deny the effect on real estate on the ground that the court of original probate had no jurisdiction over real estate in another state.

A proceeding to probate a will is not such as falls within U. S. Const. art. 6 (4), § 1, providing full faith and credit, etc. Williams v. Jones, 14 Bush, 418.

United States Const. art. 4, § 1, does not extend the operation of a decree of probate in another state to property which was in the state at the time of the death of the testator; and such decree is only prima facie evidence of its validity. Bowen v. Johnson, 5 R. I. 112, 73 Am. Dec. 49.

And the United States Constitution does not extend the operation of the probate of a will as a judicial act of a state beyond its own territory. Olney v. Angell, 5 R. I. 198, 73 Am. Dec. 62.

Notwithstanding the constitutional clause a decree probating a will in another state does not affect real property where the will is offered in Georgia, and attested by only two witnesses. Key v. Harlan, 52 Ga. 476.

In Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407, it was said that the act of Congress declaring the effect to be given to the records and judicial proceedings of the several states, does not require that they shall have any greater force in other courts than in the courts of the state from which they are taken. In this case it was held that the probate of a will in one state does not establish the validity of the will as a will devising real estate in another state, unless the laws of the latter state permit it.

In Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. 465, 6 L. ed. 367, it was said that as to whether full faith and credit should be given a probate from Maryland in Tennessee under U. S. Const., "the rule could not be applied to this case, since the laws of Maryland do not make the probate here offered evidence in a land cause in the courts of that state."

Full faith and credit were not decided in Blount v. Walker, 134 U. S. 607, 33 L. ed. 1036, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 600.

But where the court of another state had jurisdiction, and the will was duly probated there, it cannot be contested on an application to record such probate proceeding in Vermont, and the parties cannot show the incapacity of the testatrix, or undue influence, under U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1. Ives v. Salisbury, 56 Vt. 565.

Under the Constitution a will cannot be contested on offering for filing and recording. Harris v. Harris, 61 Ind. 117. (But so far as this refers to realty, it is overruled in Evansville Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. Winsor, 148 Ind. 682, 48 N. E. 592.)

ton v. Allison, 7 Humph. 328; St. John's Lodge No. 1 v. Callender, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 335; Sawyer v. Dozier, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 97; Enloe v. Sherrill, 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 212. In Pinson v. Ivey, 1 Yerg. 349, this court says: "Proceedings are had in the nature of proceedings in rem, and without notice, in courts admitting wills to probate and granting administration, and the expectancy of heirs and distributees swept away, when the weakness of infancy or residence in a foreign land should seemingly protect them, because of the permanent political consideration that the rights of property thus situated should be speedily settled by a legal ascertainment of them. All of which adjudications are directed by public policy and necessity, regardless, to some extent, of private rights." And in Fry v. Taylor, 1 Head, 595, held to be a proceeding in rem, and binding upon all interested, whether parties or not. The proof of a will has been held to be a proceeding in rem, because it determines the status of the subject-matter (Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 65), and is conclusive and effectual for all purposes (Crippen v. Deater, 13 Gray, 330). Wells, Res Adjudicata, § 576.

In this case now under examination, this record does not disclose the fact that in the proceedings, in the state of Mississippi, the parties now seeking to contest the validity of those proceedings were served with any notice or voluntarily appeared in those proceedings, and whatever faith and credit shall be given now in this court to these acts and judicial proceedings of the court of the state of Mississippi must be given, by reason of the injunction of the Federal Constitution, as a proceeding in rem, and, under the prin-ing original probate. Thomas v. Morrisett, 76 Ga. 384.

The probate is a judicial act, and authenticates the right of the executor to sue in another state under the Federal Constitution and act of Congress. Stephens v. Smart, 4 N. C. (1 Car. Law Repos.) 471; Lancaster v. McBryde, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 421.

And the same was said to be the rule in Hyman v. Gaskins, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 267.

In Crippen v. Dexter, 13 Gray, 330, it was held that a decree of a probate court of another state, admitting to probate a will within its jurisdiction, is conclusive evidence, if duly authenticated, of the validity of the will upon an application to prove it in this state; even when no notice of the offer of the will for probate was given, if by the law of that state no such notice was required. In this case it was said: "But as to all those facts which are necessary to the establishment of a will, in whichever form the case is entertained, and as to the regularity of the proceedings and their conformity to the law of the state or country where they are had, the judgment itself must be held conclusive; it is required by the rule of the Constitution of the United States, which requires that the acts and judicial proceedings in one state shall be respected in the courts and tribunals of others; and by the rule of the common law, giving effect to judgments of other states, where they have a peculiar jurisdiction in case of proceedings in rem, and have custody of the subject-matter."

The same faith and credit are given to the record that it had in the state from whence it came. Balfour v. Chew, 5 Mart. N. S. 517.

A decree authenticated under the act of Congress, and the proceedings are presumed to have been by competent authority and in conformity to the local laws, and the records are evidence, not only of the acts of the court, but of its jurisdiction. House v. House, 16 Tex. 598.

Under the Constitution and act of Congress the record of a probate of a will in another state imports absolute verity for the purpose of evidence. Balfour v. Chew, 5 Mart. N. S. 517; Halle v. Hill, 13 Mo. 612; Lewis v. St. Louis, 69 Mo. 595, Affirmed 3 Mo. App. 582; Bradstreet v. Kinsella, 76 Mo. 63; Newman v. Willetts, 52 Ill. 98.

V. Conclusiveness of decrees of probate from another state.

a. Generally.

There is some conflict of authority as to the 48 L. R. A.

conclusive effect of a decree from another state probating a will. This is due in some cases to the construction placed on statutory provisions, and in some cases to the question of domicile, and in others to the kind of property affected.

Some cases hold that the decree from another state is not conclusive, and that the will is open to contest, as in Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. 565, 6 L. ed. 161.

And the decree probating a will as to land is open to contest. Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60.

And has no effect as to land. M'Cormick v. Sullivant, 10 Wheat. 192, 6 L. ed. 300; Budd v. Brooke, 3 Gill, 198, 43 Am. Dec. 321.

And a decree of probate from another state is not conclusive in an action of ejectment. Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. 465, 6 L. ed. 367; Pennel v. Weyant, 2 Harr. (Del.) 501.

And such a decree may be contested on offering it for record. Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286; Ives v. Allyn, 12 Vt. 589; Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13 (prior to 1852); Es parte Povall, 8 Leigh, 816; Markwell v. Thorn, 28 Wis. 548; Re Barr, 30 Ohio L. J. 386; Evansville Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. Winsor, 148 Ind. 682, 48 N. E. 592, Overruling: Harris v. Harris, 61 Ind. 117. As to real estate, see subd. VI., Indiana.

And in Roberts v. Flanagan, 21 Neb. 503, 32 N. W. 563, it was said that such a decree may be attacked by a direct proceeding.

And a decree of another state is only prima facie evidence of the validity of the will. Bowen v. Johnson, 5 R. I. 112, 73 Am. Dec. 49.

And a decree from another state is of no effect if the court had no jurisdiction, or if the probate is obtained by fraud. Allaire v. Allaire, 37 N. J. L. 312.

A decree from another state rejecting a will for incapacity of the testator has no effect on probate here. Rice v. Jones, 4 Call (Va.) 80.

And a decree of probate in another state rejecting a will is not conclusive as to personal property in New York. Re Gaines, 84 Hun. 520, 32 N. Y. Supp. 398, Affirmed in 154 N. Y. 747, 49 N. E. 1097.

And such a decree has only the effect of a proceeding in rem. Ibid.

And a decree from another state has no effect as to personalty in Rhode Island until filed and recorded. Olney v. Angell, 5 R. I. 198, 78 Am. Dec. 62.

And a decree from another state has no effect as to land until allowed and admitted to record.

ciples of the common law discussed above, statutes have been passed in our state with reference to the probate of wills in the foreign state, and are as follows: Section 3916, Shannon's Code Tennessee, provides for the recording of a will in Tennessee upon presenting a copy thereof, duly authenticated, and says that when so recorded it shall have the same force and effect as if the original had been executed in this state, and proved and allowed by the courts of this state. Section 3917 provides that such will, if proved according to the laws of this state, shall be sufficient to pass land and other estate. Section 3918 provides for the authentication of the same under the act of Congress. Section 3921 provides that, when there shall be goods and chattels in this state to be administered under such sale, the executors, or some one of them, may qualify as such, and shall give bond, with surety, as required in cases where the will was made within the limits of this state, and be subject to be proceeded against as in other cases. Section 3922 provides that any person interested in contesting the validity of such will may do so in the same manner as though it had been originally presented and probated in said court. All of these provisions are taken from the act of 1823.

This court in the case of Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60, has passed upon this act of 1823, brought into these sections of the Code. Says Judge Milligan: "The question involves the consideration of the effect of a foreign probate, and especially the effect of the probate of the will in question before the 'register of wills' in the state of Pennsylvania. As a general rule of law, the judgment of a probate court allowing proof of a will, and Apperson v. Bolton, 29 Ark. 418; Pott v. Pennington, 16 Minn. 509, Gil. 460.

Such a decree has no effect until allowed and recorded. Slayton v. Singleton, 72 Tex. 209, 9 S. W. 876; Walton v. Hall, 66 Vt. 455, 29 Atl. 803.

In Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407, it was said that the decree of probate from another state has no greater effect than in the state where probate was allowed.

If a will probated in another state affects real and personal property, and is not executed so as to pass real property, it cannot be allowed as to personalty only. Dublin v. Chadbourn, 16 Mass. 433.

And a decree from another state is not extra-territorial. Thrasher v. Ballard, 33 W. Va. 285, 10 S. E. 411.

As to whether such a decree can be set aside is not decided. Loring v. Oakley, 98 Mass. 267.

As to whether a foreign probate is effective where the will is not in accord with the laws of this state, is not decided. Harrison v. Weatherby, 180 Ill. 418, 54 N. E. 237.

The probate of a will in the state of Pennsylvania gave it no validity whatever in respect to lands in Virginia or Ohio, where the will was not probated in such states, as it is an acknowledged principle of law that the title and disposition of real property are exclusively settled by the laws of the country where it is situated. McCormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. 192, 6 L. ed. 300.

And in regard to wills of land in Maryland, courts of that state are only authorized to take probate, and if title to land is claimed under such a will the validity of the will must be proved by other evidence than a mere exemplified copy of its probate in the state of Virginia. Budd v. Brooke, 3 Gill, 198, 43 Am. Dec. 321.

The Maryland rule controls in the District of Columbia. Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407.

Maryland act 1798, chap. 2, art. 3, providing that an attested copy of a will recorded in any office authorized to record the same shall be admitted in evidence in any court of law or equity, provided that the execution of the original will shall be subject to be contested until a probate has been had according to this act,—does not extend to a will of lands so as to make the probate conclusive evidence in an action of ejectment, in Tennessee. Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. 465, 6 L. ed. 367.

The testamentary disposition of immovable property must conform to the law of the place 48 L. R. A.

where the property is situated, both as respects the power and capacity of the testator, and the forms and solemnities required to give the will effect. Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286. (The statute which allowed this contest of probate from another state was omitted from the Code in 1852.)

Under Va. Rev. Code, chap. 104, § 16, p. 378, providing that authenticated copies of wills proved according to the laws of any of the United States, and relative to any estate within this commonwealth, may be offered for probate in the general court, and "the proof to be made by the witnesses shall be conformed to the nature of the case. But such will shall be liable to be contested and controverted in the same manner as the original might have been."—If the authenticated copy shows that the will has been so proved in another state as that, if proved in like manner by witnesses here, it could only be admitted as a will of personalty, it will be so admitted here; but if the evidence taken in the foreign court be such that if taken in this court it would be sufficient to establish it as a will of lands, it will be admitted to probate here also as a will of lands. Ex parte Povall, 3 Leigh, 816.

And in proceedings to admit to record authenticated copies of a foreign probate it is competent for the court to admit persons to appear in such proceedings to take adverse steps. Re Barr, 30 Ohio L. J. 386. In this case the court said: "The circuit court, in passing upon a similar application of this same will, expressed the opinion that the offer for record is an ex parte proceeding only."

Where a foreign will devising land in Indiana is admitted to probate on authentication of the probate from another state, any person interested in the estate may contest the same within the time prescribed under Burns's (Ind.) Rev. Stat. 1897, § 2770, providing that when a foreign will has been admitted to probate, or may be offered for record, any person interested in the estate may contest such will within the time, in the manner, and for any cause prescribed by laws of Indiana in cases of domestic wills. (Harris v. Harris, 61 Ind. 117, so far as it refers to realty, was overruled.) Evansville Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. Winsor, 148 Ind. 682, 48 N. E. 592.

Where a will probated in Michigan was probated upon a certified copy in Nebraska, and subsequently a party claimed that the will was not legally probated, and asked that an administration with the will annexed be granted to W., and claimed that there had been no evidence of admitting it to probate, is in the nature of a proceeding in rem—that is, an adjudication pronounced . . . upon the status of a particular subject-matter by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose, and therefore binding and conclusive upon the rights of all persons interested in the property to be administered, though they are not named as parties." Redf. Wills, pt. 2, pp. 55, 56, and numerous authorities cited; Crippen v. Dexter, 13 Gray, 330; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 490; Patton v. Allison, 7 Humph. 320. And again says: "Now, what is the effect of the judgment of probate in the state of Pennsylvania, when certified according to act of Congress, in this state? Under our statutes, is it to be disregarded, and open in the courts of Tennessee to reprobate and contestation? We think clearly not. It is established beyond all controversy, both in this country and in England, that, the jurisdiction of probate courts being exclusive in regard to all matters pertaining to the settlement of estates of deceased persons, the decrees of such courts upon the probate of wills and issuing letters testamentary, as well as of administration, are absolutely unimpeachable and conclusive in all other courts, both in law and equity. 'And such decrees, says Mr. Redfield on Wills, part 2, p. 47, 'cannot be impeached, even by showing fraud, except by a petition to the court rendering the decree, who may annul or modify the same.' " The conclusion of the learned judge, after a review of this whole question, is that, as to movable or personal property, the probate of a will in another state, duly certified to in this state under act of Congress, is conclusive. This conclusion is evidently arrived the execution of the will or of the testamentary capacity of the deceased, the court said: "If this was a direct proceeding to set aside the probate of the will, and all the evidence upon which such probate was made was before the court, we might hold that the proof was insufficient; in this collateral proceeding, however, we cannot so hold. Jurisdiction being established, all presumptions are in favor of the judgment of the probate court." Roberts v. Flanagan, 21 Neb. 503, 32 N. W. 563.

The surrogate, in admitting a foreign will probated in another state to be recorded, acts judicially. He is to assign time and place for hearing, and to give notice. "He is not required to admit the will to record and issue letters thereon, if the foreign probate shall be duly exemplified. He has a judicial discretion to refuse the probate, if sufficient cause appear to the contrary. If it shall appear that the court in which the foreign probate was obtained had no jurisdiction, or that the probate was obtained by fraud, or that it has been reversed on appeal, or that an appeal is pending, or if any other legal grounds of objection are made to appear which in his judgment are good cause for withholding the probate, he may do so," under Nix. (N. J.) Dig. 1033 (1846), authorizing an exemplification of probate of a will in another state to be admitted to record. Allaire v. Allaire, 37 N. J. L. 312.

Where a holographic will made in Louisiana was refused probate there as false, fraudulent, and forged, and the decree there affirmed by the supreme court, it was held that the rejected will, not having been executed according to the laws of New York, could be proved there only as a will of personal property. As to whether the decree of the Louisiana court is conclusive against a party to such decree, it was held that the decree established the fact that the rejected instrument was not the will of the testatrix so far as administration in Louisiana is concerned; "but we doubt whether it had any greater efficacy than this. Apart from any statute, all administrations of estates in different countries are independent so far as the matter of strict right of jurisdiction is concerned; it is only as a matter of comity that administration in one jurisdiction respects those in other jurisdictions." Re Gaines, 84 Hun, 520, 32 N. Y. Supp. 398. Affirmed in 154 N. Y. 747, 49 N. E. 1097. In this case the court said that it is questionable whether the courts of Louisiana have any further jurisdiction than to make a decree binding assets within that state; and while the judgment itself cannot be impeached, it does not follow that it establishes conclusively between the parties the facts and grounds on which it proceeds, as would be the case ordinarily with domestic judgments.

The probate of a will in another state is only prima facie evidence of its validity, on an application to a probate court in Rhode Island to allow a copy of the same to be filed and recorded. Bowen v. Johnson, 5 R. I. 112, 73 Am. Dec. 49. It was further held that U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1, does not extend the operation of such a decree to property which was in this state at the time of the death of the testator.

In the above case it was said that R. I. Rev. Stat. chap. 155, §§ 5-10 (see infra), did not proceed upon the supposition that a foreign probate, or the probate of a will in another state, which are placed upon the same footing, is conclusive as to the validity of the will here as a will either of real or personal estate, but, on the contrary, supposes that neither is of any force to operate upon property here except so far as the statute accords it to them, and therefore the statute makes extraterritorial probate prima facie evidence only of the due execution of the extraterritorial will when proper proceedings are instituted here for its allowance and record, leaving it for those who, upon notice issued, appear to object to the will, to show cause, if any they have, against the filing and recording of the same.

A decree of probate in another state is a decree in rem, and necessarily in great part upon constructive notice, and whatever other operation is allowed to it is a mere matter of comity, and the legislation of nearly all the states proceeds upon the supposition that such is the limited operation of the probate of a will in another state, and provides some mode by which conclusive operation may be given to such a will within the state, full notice being given to all persons interested, in order that they may appear and contest the validity of the same. United States Const. art. 4, § 1, does not extend the operation of the probate of a will as a judicial act of a state beyond its own territory. Olney v. Angell, 5 R. I. 198, 73 Am. Dec. 62. In this case the court said: Our conclusion is that we cannot give effect to the Wisconsin probate of the will as evidence of its validity in order to allow the will to operate upon personal property in Rhode Island before it is filed and recorded in the proper probate court, in pursuance to R. I. Rev. Stat. chap. 155, §§ 5-10, providing that when a copy of a will which has been proved in any of the United States shall be directed to be filed and recorded in the pro-at by considering what the law was before this statute, and then determining that the statute did not, in terms, so clearly change the common law as to establish a new rule as to movables.

Independent of this statute, and independent of the "full faith and credit" requirements of the Federal Constitution, the common-law rule is, as we have shown, supra, that movables or personal property is governed by the lex domicilii; that proceedings of probate are proceedings in rem, and bind every man interested, whether a party or not. These two propositions have been approved by this court in the cases of Pinson v. Ivey, 1 Yerg. 349, and Fry v. Taylor, 1 Head, 595, cited supra. And that the comity of states and sound public policy require that these rules of common law should be applied to the probate proceedings of other states, is approved in this case of Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60. This case has been the law of this court for many years, and, although not strictly a rule of property, having force only as to personality, we think it should be now adhered to. Until some step is taken to set aside the probate made at the domicil of the testator, it is, as we have shown above, an adjudication binding as to this property within its jurisdiction.

It is contended upon the part of petitioners in this case, however, that inasmuch as the question, independent of the Federal Constitution, of what faith shall be given to the judicial proceedings of another state, is one of comity, and that inasmuch as, under the laws of Mississippi, no faith and credit is given in that state to the probate of a will in a foreign state, therefore this court should, under the same rule, give no faith or probate court in this state, it shall then be of the same force and effect as filing an original will proved in said court; but nothing shall make valid a will that is not executed according to the law of this state.

In an action by an executrix on a will probated in another state to recover for trespass for cutting timber in this state, it was held that if the will purported to devise real estate it could not affect the land until it was proved and allowed in this state, and the executor had no standing in the court. Pott v. Pennington, 16 Minn. 509, Gil. 460.

The foreign probate of a will gives no validity to such will until certified to and registered in some county within the state under Tex. act March 23, 1887, § 1, providing that when any will disposing of land in this state has been duly probated according to the laws of any of the United States or territories, a copy thereof and its probate authenticated may be filed and recorded in the register of deeds; and § 3, providing that every such will and its probate which shall be delivered to be recorded shall take effect and be valid as a deed of conveyance. Slayton v. Singleton, 72 Tex. 209, 9 S. W. 876.

A will probated in another state directed the making of an allotment and division of the property and its conveyance to the devisees, and this was done before the probate of the will in Texas, where the land was situated. It was held that, although the will could not be used as evidence in the courts of this state until probated here, yet that such conveyance was valid, since the devisees took by force of the devise of the will, and not through the conveyance of title. Welder v. McComb, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 85, 80 S. W. 822.

Where the testator died domiciled in Vermont, leaving a will made when he was domiciled in Illinois, and owned real estate and notes there, and the will was duly probated in Illinois but not in Vermont, it was held that full faith and credit are given to the probate in Illinois, when it is permitted to make the will effective to pass property having its situs there; but Vt. Rev. Laws, § 2049, providing that no will shall pass either real or personal estate unless proved and allowed in the probate court or on appeal in the county or supreme court, refers to property in Vermont, and, not having been proved and allowed in Vermont, cannot pass property in such state. Walton v. Hall, 66 Vt. 455, 29 Atl. 803.

In Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. 555, 6 L. ed. 161, it was said that under Ohio act January 25, 1816, providing that authenticated copies of 48 L. R. A.

wills proved according to the laws of any state or territory relating to any estate within this state are allowed to be proved in the court of the county where such estate shall be, and when so proved and admitted to record are declared to be good and valid as wills made in that state, but subject to be contested as the original might have been, if a copy of a will probated in Kentucky was offered for probate in Ohio it might have been contested, and the sentence of the court of probate might have been not to admit it in evidence.

And a will probated in Virginia must be deemed conclusive so far as that state is concerned, and the will held sufficient to pass all property which can be there transferred by a valid instrument of that kind; but such probate has no effect by the laws of Maryland, which govern the District of Columbia, in regard to real estate, and the probate is not evidence of its execution, but that must be shown by the production of the instrument itself and proof by the subscribing witnesses, or, if they be not living, by proof of their handwriting. Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407. (See also Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. 465, 6 L. ed. 387.)

In Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407, it was said: "Its probate must therefore be deemed conclusive so far as that state is concerned, and the will held sufficient to pass all property which can be there transferred by a valid instrument of that kind. But no greater effect can be given out of Virginia to the proceedings in the Hustings court. The probate establishes nothing beyond the validity of the will there. It does not take the place of provisions necessary to its validity as a will of real property in other states if they are wanting. Its validity as such will in other states depends on its execution in conformity with their laws; and if probate there be also required, such probate must be had before it can be received as evidence."

In Dublin v. Chadbourne, 16 Mass. 433, it was said that if a will probated in another state is not attested and subscribed in the manner provided by our laws, objection may be made in the probate court of Massachusetts, and will be sufficient to prevent the filing and recording of the will, under the Massachusetts statute, providing that nothing in this act shall be construed to make valid any will or codicil that is not attested and subscribed in the manner the laws of this commonwealth direct.

In Thrasher v. Ballard, 83 W. Va. 285, 10 S. E. 411, it was said that W. Va. Code, chap. 77, credit to its judicial proceedings. This suggestion we do not think should weigh in the construction of our own state statutes, as we think that the statutes of each state should be considered with reference to its own internal polity, rather than a lex talionis to the statute of other states. Mahorner v. Hooe, 9 Smedes & M. 247.

The remaining question, then, to be determined, is, What is the character of the property that is in controversy under this will? The amended petition, evidently filed by the petitioners to avoid the effect of this case of Williams v. Saunders, states that J. S. Hall, and the husband of said Ferreba A. Hall, at the time of his death, was the owner of a mortgage on real estate situated in Shelby county, Tennessee, and that, by will executed according to the laws of Mississippi and Tennessee, the said J. S. Hall devised said mortgage, and his title to the said property, in the said county of Shelby and state of Tennessee, to his wife, the said Ferreba A. Hall. They further state that, by her will herein filed and recorded, the said Ferreba A. Hall undertook to dispose of the said property and legal title to said real estate. The said mortgages were made and executed by D. O. Branch, and his wife, Mary Branch, and are recorded in the register's office, Shelby county, Tennessee. It will be noticed that nothing is said in this petition as to the indebtedness these mortgages secure. By reference, however, to the will of the said Ferreba A. Hall, which is a part of the record in this case and the will under contest, it will be noticed that she sets out in detail the debts which are secured by these mortgages. In item 8 of this will, there is bequeathed to Mary Branch, the wife of D. O. Branch, § 25, makes provision for the probate of wills made elsewhere, relative to estates here, by production in this state of a copy of the will and foreign probate, and provides that the same shall be admitted as a will of personal estate only, or real estate also, according to what is shown by the probate abroad. "If the foreign probate were conclusive and effective without this statute, why this statute?" The court says such acts "were enacted because of the general principle that judicial proceedings in one state have no extraterritorial force as to estate beyond the state which is governed by the laws of the place of its situation."

In Harrison v. Weatherby, 180 Ill. 418, 54 N. E. 237, as to whether it was intended to confer any validity upon a foreign will that would be invalid under our laws by Starr & C. (Ill.) Stat. 2d ed. 4040, § 9, providing that wills made and proved out of this state are only good and available in law in like manner as wills made and executed in this state when authenticated according to the laws of the United States, was not decided.

The decree is only conclusive as to property which can be transferred at the place of probate. Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407.

But in Ward v. Oates, 43 Ala. 515, it was held that the decree has the same effect as the state of probate gives to decrees from this state.

In Brock v. Frank, 51 Ala. 85, the decree from another state was held conclusive in the absence of statute. (The statute was changed since the decision of Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286, contra.)

And is conclusive as to personalty if probated at the domicile. Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13.

And is conclusive as to validity of will. (Stat.) Babcock v. Collins, 60 Minn. 73, 61 N. W. 1020.

And a will of personal property cannot be contested as to incapacity or undue influence on an application to record the same, although the domicile was in Vermont, but assets were in Indiana where probated. (Rev. Laws, § 2057.) Ives v. Salisbury, 58 Vt. 565.

And the decree is conclusive if duly authenticated. Crippen v. Dexter, 13 Gray, 330.

And a decree of another state in a proceeding contradictorily taken between the executor and the next of kin, establishing an instrument as a last will, must be taken as fixed by the judgment. Galnes's Succession, 45 La. Ann. 1237, 14 So. 233.

And the decree from another state will be 48 L. R. A.

held valid as to property in the other state. Wells v. Wells, 85 Miss. 638; Montgomery v. Millikin, 5 Smedes & M. 151, 43 Am. Dec. 607; Bate v. Incisa, 59 Miss. 513.

In Re Hudson, 5 Redf. 833, and Sturdivant v. Neill, 27 Miss. 157, it was said that the decree probating a will in another state will be held valid if the court had jurisdiction.

And the decree will be held valid if the will is executed and proved according to Ohio laws. Carpenter v. Denoon, 29 Ohio St. 379.

And the decree is valid if the will is made according to the laws of the other state, under N. H. Laws, chap. 194, § 12; Kennard v. Kennard, 63 N. H. 303.

And the decree is conclusive as to executor's right to sue. (Full faith, etc.) Stephens v. Smart, 4 N. C. (1 Car. Law Repos.) 471; Lancaster v. McBryde, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 421.

In Corrigan v. Jones, 14 Colo. 314, 23 Pac. 913, and Hyman v. Gaskins, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 267, the same was said to be the rule.

If the decree from another state shows that the will was duly proved at probating, it must be admitted to probate. State v. Iberville Probate Ct. Judge, 8 Mart. N. S. 586.

And the decree must be admitted for record if certified according to the act of Congress. Lytle's Succession, 1 Rob. (La.) 268.

So, when the decree from another state is offered for record the execution of the will need not be proved. Paschal v. Acklin, 27 Tex. 192.

An exemplified copy must be recorded, or else the will must be probated here. Keith v. Keith, 97 Mo. 224, 10 S. W. 597; Graves v. Ewart, 99 Mo. 13, 11 S. W. 971; Van Syckel v. Beam, 110 Mo. 589, 19 S. W. 946.

In Hall v. Ashby, 9 Ohio 96, 34 Am. Dec. 424, it was said that the purpose of recording a copy from foreign probate is to allow a copy to be used in evidence.

b. After filing for record.

After the decree from another state is allowed for record it is conclusive in regard to real estate in a collateral proceeding. Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13.

And after allowance for record the decree cannot be collaterally attacked. Dickey v. Vann, 81 Ala. 425, 8 So. 195; Townsend v. Downer, 32 Vt. 183; Acklin v. Paschal, 48 Tex. 147; Calloway v. Cooley, 50 Kan. 743, 32 Pac. 372; Stanley v. Morse, 26 Iowa, 454; Mackin's Estate, 14 Phila. 328; Lovett v. Mathews, 24 Pa. 330; Ward v. Hearne, 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 184.

"three thousand dollars, to be credited upon the two notes which I hold, executed by said D. O. Branch and his wife, Mary Branch, for twenty-five hundred dollars each, one of which is dated January 12, 1892, and due five years after date, and bears interest from date at 6 per cent per annum; and the other is dated January 11, 1892, and due four years after date, and bears interest from date at the rate of 6 per cent per annum." It is evident, therefore, that the property in controversy in this cause is these two notes, amounting to $5,000, secured by mortgage upon the property of the husband, D. O. Branch. It is well settled in Tennessee that the mortgage is but an incident of the debt itself, however evidenced. It is equally well settled that promissory notes, although secured by mortgage, are personal property, and go to the administrator for the payment of debts, or, if no debts, then for distribution to the distributees of the deceased. This being so, then this case is brought clearly under the decision of Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60, and the principles discussed therein. McGan v. Marshall, 7 Humph. 127; Ferguson v. Coward, 12 Heisk. 572; Vaughn v. Vaughn, 100 Tenn. 284, 45 S. W. 677; Leech v. Hillsman, 8 Lea, 747; Clark v. Jones, 93 Tenn. 641, 27 S. W. 1009.

The decree of the court below is affirmed, and the petition is dismissed, with costs.

Wilkes, J., dissenting:

With all due deference for the very able opinion of the majority, I am unable to agree with their holding, and with the construction given to our statutes, and the effect accorded by that opinion to the foreign probate of a will. It appears that this probate

And after probate in this state, whether the decree is conclusive in ejectment as to capacity or undue influence, was not determined. Otto v. Doty, 61 Iowa, 23, 15 N. W. 578.

VI. Classification by states.

Federal cases.

The probate of a will of one state does not establish the validity of a will as a will devising real estate in another state, unless the laws of the latter state permit it. But the validity of the will, or of the probate, may be determined by the laws of the state in which the property is situated. Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407.

In the above case it was said that the case of McCormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. 192, 6 L. ed. 300 (as to land in Ohio), shows that the probate of a will of real property in one state is of no force in establishing the validity of the will in another state. "That must be determined by the law of the state where the property is situated." It was further said that the case of Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. 465, 6 L. ed. 367, shows that the proof of a devise of land in ejectment in Maryland must be made by the production of the will in court and evidence of its execution by the subscribing witness, or, if the will be lost or cannot be proved, proof must be made of secondary evidence of its execution and contents.

Where a will was executed in South Carolina, conferring the power on the donee to be exercised by her last will and testament duly executed, and the donee died in North Carolina and made a will probated there, and an exemplified copy was recorded in South Carolina under the statute, and it was contended that the probate in North Carolina was conclusive as to this being the last will and testament duly executed, and that full force and credit must be given this in South Carolina, it was conceded that the probate in North Carolina established that the will was her last will and testament duly executed; but in neither of the states would a will as such dispose of property that did not belong to the testatrix. Blount v. Walker, 134 U. S. 607, 33 L. ed. 1036, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606. Alabama.

The probate of a will, whether of personality or realty, or of personality and realty, when the in Mississippi was in common form. I am of opinion that, while the probate of a will in common form made in Mississippi is binding and conclusive until set aside (as it is in Tennessee), still such probate in common form in Mississippi, as well as in any other foreign state in which the practice prevails, leaves the will subject to contest in Tennessee, under § 3922, Shannon's Code, to the same extent and in the same manner as if the probate in common form had been made in Tennessee originally. To hold differently would be to give to a probate in common form in another state, upon its mere certification and registration here, the force and effect of a probate in solemn form, which is a greater effect than is accorded it at home. To use the present will probated in common form in Mississippi as an illustration: By the statutes and decisions of that state, probate in common form is held to be merely an incipient step to give the court jurisdiction of the matter, and is not conclusive upon the parties interested, but may be opened and set aside in the courts of that state upon sufficient legal grounds. Hamberlin v. Terry, Smedes & M. Ch. 589; Cowden v. Dobyns, 5 Smedes & M. 82; Wall v. Wall, 30 Miss. 91, 64 Am. Dec. 147. And such proceeding in common form cannot be pleaded as res judicata in a direct proceeding to determine the validity of the will (Martin v. Perkins, 56 Miss. 204); and a probate in common form may be set aside upon petition filed, and sufficient legal grounds shown, without any issue of deviseavit vel non being made up and tried by a jury (Wall v. Wall, 30 Miss. 91, 64 Am. Dec. 147). This being the full force, effect, and extent of a probate in common form in the state of Mississippi, it court decreeing it has jurisdiction, is a decree or a judgment de rem having all the force and effect peculiar to such a judgment or decree. The decree is not only evidence, but it is conclusive and final, and no other tribunal will re-examine or permit to be drawn in litigation the validity or invalidity of the will, and, in the absence of statutory provisions in regulation of the subject, the sentence of probate in the proper tribunal of the domicile of the testator is conclusive everywhere as to the capacity of the testator, the due execution and validity of the will, and no question can arise of ancillary probate except as to the validity and authentication of the original probate. Brock v. Frank, 51 Ala. 85.

And the same is held in regard to personality. Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13.

In Brock v. Frank, 51 Ala. 85, it was said: "The statute of 1806 (Clay's Dig. 598, § 12) provided for the probate in this state of authenticated copies of wills, proved according to the laws of any of the United States touching or concerning estates within this state, but declared, 'such will shall be liable to be contested and controverted in the same manner as the original might have been.' In Varner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 286, this statute was construed as enlarging the jurisdiction of our courts of probate, in so far as it provided for a contestation here of the will of a testator having his domicile abroad. The Code, generally re-enacting substantially pre-existing statutes, and its framers and the legislature adopting it having knowledge of the construction these statutes had received from the courts, omitted all provisions for the contestation here of a foreign will, though making express provision for its probate. The just conclusion is, that it was not intended to confer on our courts of probate jurisdiction of such a controversy."

The same force and effect are to be given to a transcript of a foreign probate of a will as would be given to the original proceeding in the state of Texas, where a will has been admitted to probate and record out of the state, but within the United States, and all that is necessary is the production here of said will, or a copy of the same, and the probate thereof certified by the clerk of the court in which the will has been proved, and the certificate of the judge of such court that the attestation is genuine and by the proper officer. Ward v. Oates, 43 Ala. 515.

The probate of a will in Alabama on an authentication of a probate in Tennessee cannot be collaterally attacked, although the judgment of the probate court of Alabama may have been erroneous for lack of proof in failing to show that each of the three witnesses attested the instrument in the presence of the testator, and the proof of execution and the probate here were made without giving notice to the widow or next of kin, as this was not required by statute. Dickey v. Vann, 81 Ala. 425, 8 So. 195.

Arkansas.
Where a will was probated in Tennessee, and letters testamentary granted, the will was authority to sell lands, and not the letters. They were merely evidence of his authority to execute the power conferred upon him by the will; but the executor could not sell lands in Arkansas under the power conferred upon him by the will, until the will was properly admitted to probate under the Arkansas law. Apperson v. Bolton, 29 Ark. 418.

Colorado.
In Corrigan v. Jones, 14 Colo. 314, 23 Pac. 913, it was said that the probate of a will in Missouri, and the record thereof, can only be questioned by some appellate or direct proceeding, and, having been duly admitted to probate in Missouri, should, on presentation of duly certified record, have been admitted to probate and record in this state according to Colo. Gen. Stat. chap. 115.

Connecticut.
Under Connecticut statutes wills executed out of this state have all the force and effect of domestic wills. Irwin's Appeal, 33 Conn. 128.

Delaware.
The validity of a will of land situated in Delaware, made by a nonresident and not proved here, may be tried in ejectment if the will be given in evidence by one claiming under it in an action by the heir, and where such will of land in Delaware has been proved abroad, the foreign probate is not conclusive here, but may be controverted. Fennel v. Weyant, 2 Harr. (Del.) 501.

And a nuncupative will probated in another state has no effect until probate is made in this state. St. James's Church v. Walker, 1 Del. Ch. 284.

Florida.
Under Fla. act November 20, 1828, § 59, providing for admitting to record probate of wills granted in any other states providing they shall have conformed to the laws of Florida in the form and manner of probate, a will in another state, executed by an insufficient number of witnesses, is of no effect in Florida. Crolley v. Clark, 20 Fla. 849.

would be an anomaly if the mere certification of such probate to this state, and registration here, should give the probate any greater weight or greater sanctity or more binding force than it possessed in the jurisdiction where the proceeding was had. The Constitution of the United States provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, and leaves it to Congress to declare the effect thereof. The act of Congress provides that judicial proceedings, properly authenticated, shall have such faith and credit given them in every court in the United States as they have, by law or usage, in the courts of the state whence the said records are or shall be taken. See Shannon's Code, p. 112. Nor can the proceedings be given any greater weight or effect because of any spirit of comity supposed to exist towards our sister state. The statute of Mississippi provides that personal property situated in that state shall be governed and controlled in the distribution thereof by the laws of that state, without regard to the domicile of the owner, and without regard to the domicile of the persons entitled to receive the same. Miss. Code 1892, § 1542; Miss. Code 1871, § 1950; Carroll v. McPike, 53 Miss. 569. And by § 1829 of that Code it is provided that a will executed and probated in another state, and filed for record in Mississippi, is there subject to contest in the same manner as if it had originally been probated in that state. It will be observed that these statutes reserve rights, not only in favor of citizens, but extend them also to all persons, whether the heirs or persons entitled to distribution be

And, if recorded, has no more effect than a domestic will. Fraser v. Boggs, 37 Fla. 307, 20 So. 245.

So, under McLennan's (Fla.) Dig. p. 987, § 8, providing that probate of wills granted in any of the states relating to property in this state shall be admitted to record, and shall have the same force and effect as wills executed in this state, provided they conform to the laws of this state in form and manner of execution, the statute does not give any effect to a will probated in Connecticut passing after-acquired property, although it may have that effect in Connecticut, as the probate comes here if executed as required by our laws, with the same effectiveness as though it had been executed in this state. Ibid.

Georgia.

If a will undertakes to devise lands in another state, the law of the state where the lands are located must be strictly followed, or the will does not affect realty. Knight v. Wheedon, 104 Ga. 300, 30 S. E. 794.

And a will admitted to probate in Tennessee, attested by only two witnesses, cannot be probated in Georgia so as to affect real property. Key v. Harlan, 52 Ga. 476. In this case it was said that the United States Constitution did not make judgments of other states domestic judgments to all intents and purposes, but only gave a general credit to them as evidence, and the law of the place where land is situated controls in the matter of forms and solemnities requisite to give effect to a will designed to operate on the same.

In the above case the case of Doe ex dem. Dooly v. Roe, 31 Ga. 593, holding that an exemplified copy of a will probated in Maryland may be a good muniment of title to real estate in Georgia though not probated or recorded in this state, was distinguished, as in that case no question arose as to the attestation by the number of witnesses.

As to realty, the law of the place where the property is situated governs, and a will of personal or movable property, regularly made according to the forms and solemnities required by the law of the testator's domicile, is sufficient to pass his personal or movable property in every other country in which it is situated. Lattine v. Clements, 3 Ga. 426.

So, where a will was probated in Kentucky, a certified copy of the record of probate should be admitted to probate in Georgia as affecting personality, having been executed according to the law of Kentucky. Knight v. Wheedon, 104 Ga. 300, 30 S. E. 794.

And where the probate of a will was resisted in Alabama by all the heirs upon the ground that the court had not jurisdiction as the testatrix was domiciled in Georgia at the time of her death, a judgment admitting the will to probate concludes the same parties and also an administrator appointed in Georgia, and the administration in Georgia should be set aside under U. S. Const. art. 4, § 4, and act of Congress May 19, 1790, providing full faith and credit, etc. Thomas v. Morrisett, 76 Ga. 384.

Illinois.

Where a will was offered in evidence, and it was objected that there was not sufficient evidence of its due execution and proof in the state of New York, it was held that the will was sufficiently proved, as the certificate of probate in New York conformed to the statute of Illinois, and it sufficiently appeared that the will was duly executed and proved agreeably to the laws of New York. Shepherd v. Carriel, 19 Ill. 313.

Where the certificate shows that the will was proved and admitted to record in Louisiana in accordance with the laws of that state, this record imports absolute verity, and, being properly authenticated under act of Congress May 20, 1790, providing for full faith and credit, etc., is evidence in all the courts in Illinois, although not probated in this state. Newman v. Willetts, 52 Ill. 98.

In Harrison v. Weatherby, 180 Ill. 418, 54 N. E. 237, the effect of a probate in another state was not decided.

Indiana.

Indiana act February 1, 1859, 2 Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 679, note 2, providing that in all cases of foreign wills admitted to probate, or which may be offered for record and filing in any county of this state, any person interested in the estate of the testator may contest such will as in cases of contest of domestic wills, applies only where a foreign will is offered for probate or filing; and such act does not in express terms provide for contesting a foreign will when a copy thereof, and of the probate thereof duly certified, may be offered for filing and record. Harris v. Harris, 61 Ind. 117. In this case it was said that the constitutionality of the act is at least questionable; but if it provided for contesting in this state a foreign will when a certified copy and the probate thereof were produced here for filing, such a provision would violate U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1, requiring full faith and credit, etc. (This case was overruled, so far as it refers to real property, in Evans- in the state of Mississippi or not, as to all property within its boundaries.

Coming to the consideration of our own statutes, we find all foreign wills put upon this same footing, whether probated in common form in some probate court or before the mayor of a city or corporation; the latter evidently referring to cases where provision for probate is made before such mayor by special law applicable to such locality. Now, what is the status of such foreign will already probated in another state in common form? It is in short that, when authenticated, filed, and registered in the proper place in this state, it is also effectual, as if it had been probated in common form in this state, to pass both realty and personalty, and until that is done it has no effect as a will.

This leads us to inquire what is the effect of a will probated in common form in this state. Unquestionably, under the authorities, such probate is a proceeding in rem, and binding upon all the world, unless set aside in the manner provided by statute. Reeves v. Hager, 101 Tenn. 712, 50 S.W.760, and the authorities there cited. So the probate in common form in another state is a proceeding in rem, and binding upon all the world, until set aside as provided by law. The evident purpose of our statutes is, in my opinion, to put foreign wills which have been probated in another state, and then registered here, exactly on the same footing that domestic wills probated in common form occupy; that is, each is probated by a proceeding in rem, and each is conclusive until set aside in the manner provided by law. The most difficult question that arises is whether the proceeding to set aside the probate in common form must be taken in the forum where ville Ice & Cold Storage Co. v. Winsor, 148 Ind. 682, 48 N. E. 592.)

Where the county court of Iowa passes upon and adjudicates the sufficiency of the authentication of the probate of a foreign will, and allows the same to be recorded, such adjudication cannot be collaterally questioned, under Iowa Rev. § 2329 (1297), providing that wills shall not be carried into effect unless thus allowed; and such allowance is conclusive as to the due execution of the will unless set aside by an original or appellate proceeding. Stanley v. Morse, 26 Iowa, 454.

The allowance for record of a foreign will is conclusive of the due execution of such will, under Iowa Rev. § 2328, providing that wills proved and allowed in any other state shall be allowed and recorded in this state on the production of an authenticated record. Vance v. Anderson, 30 Iowa, 426.

An original action may be maintained to set aside the probate of a foreign will on the ground that it is invalid as an instrument of title to real estate, although it may be a valid instrument under the laws of the place where probated, under Iowa Code, § 2351, providing for admitting to probate wills probated in other states, and § 2353, providing that such probate shall be conclusive as to due execution thereof until set aside by an original or appellate proceeding. Lynch v. Miller, 54 Iowa, 516, 6 N. W. 740. This will was written by the testator and attested by one witness.

Where a will is probated in a foreign state by proof of one of the subscribing witnesses, the procedure will be presumed to be regular. Otto v. Doty, 61 Iowa, 23, 15 N. W. 578. In this case it was said that whether the foreign adjudication of a probate shall be deemed conclusive in respect to the testator's testamentary capacity, or in respect to the absence of undue influence in an action of ejectment where the foreign probate has been recognized by being probated in this state, we need not determine.

It was further said that the probate of a will coming from another state might be set aside, so far as it concerns real estate in this state, if not executed in accordance with the laws of this state, under Iowa Code, § 2353, supra.

Proof of probate in another state is insufficient where the certificates of the records do not show the jurisdiction of the court or the order of the court probating the will. Re Capper, 85 Iowa, 82, 52 N. W. 6. Kentucky.

In regard to personalty, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the evidence before the court in the other state was sufficient, under Ky. Rev. Stat. chap. 106, § 21, providing for the probate of a will that has been proved in another state, and that on a certified copy the court shall presume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the will was duly executed and probated as a will of personalty, and that if it appears that the will was proved to have been so executed as to be a valid will of lands in this state by the law thereof, such copy may be admitted to probate as a will of real estate. But as to real estate it must be shown that the evidence heard in the foreign court was such as would authorize the probating of a will under our law. It was further held that a proceeding to probate a will is not such as falls within U. S. Const. art. 6 (4), § 1, providing full faith and credit, etc., and when a foreign will is probated here, if the order of the probate shows that it was admitted as a will of personalty or of realty, it will probably be conclusive; but if the order does not show that it was probated as a will of realty, it will be presumed that it was only intended to admit it as a will of personalty. Williams v. Jones, 14 Bush, 418.

In Whalen v. Nisbet, 95 Ky. 464, 26 S. W. 188, it was said that no reason exists for holding the order of probate conclusive as to domestic wills that does not equally apply to foreign wills when admitted as wills of realty, under Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 113, § 28, providing that the probate before a county court shall be conclusive except as to the jurisdiction of the court, and § 30, providing that the court, in admitting the will of a nonresident proved without the state, shall presume that the will was duly executed as a will of personalty in the state of the testator's domicile, and if it appears to have been executed as a will of lands, such copy shall be admitted to probate as a will of real property.

A will not recorded in this state nor proved on the trial is not evidence of title to land in this state. Smith v. Shackelford, 9 Dana, 452.

And an ex parte probate of a will in Indiana is not conclusive as to real estate in Kentucky, and is revoked by the birth of a child after the execution of the will. Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 460, 22 Am. Dec. 41.

So, the probate of a will in Kentucky on an authenticated copy from Illinois was set aside as a will of realty and established as a will of personalty only, where the authentication was not as required by Ky. Rev. Stat. chap. 35, p. 313, § 18, providing that faith and credit be it was made in the foreign state, or whether such proceeding can be had in this state, in the proper court, where it is offered for registration. To my mind, our statute is plain and unambiguous that the proceeding may be had in our courts, and not necessarily in the foreign court. No other construction can be given the statute (Shannon's Code, § 3922); for it could not give power to any foreign jurisdiction, nor is this in antagonism to the effect given by the act of Congress to the foreign probate, if that act applies to such probates or to proceedings in rem without actual notice. I am not now speaking of a probate in solemn form, with notice, as upon an issue of devisavit vel non or similar proceedings, when the probate is by law made final, and not correctable, except by appeal or other proceeding in error. Such was evidently the character of the probate in Pennsylvania of the will in controversy in Williams v. Saunders, reported in 5 Coldw. 60. It can be said, however, with much force and plausibility, that §§ 3916-3922, Shannon's Code, do not refer to wills which have been probated in another state, but only to such wills as have been there proven or authenticated, and these sections use the word "proven" instead of "probated" to distinguish between wills authenticated by witnesses and those probated in a court proceeding. It must be noted, however, that virtually all of our statutes in regard to the probate of wills use the word "proven" instead of "probated." Thus, we find the word "proven," in § 3896, Shannon's Code, relating to the probate of holographic wills; and in §§ 3898-3900, relating to nuncupative wills; and in § 3902, relating to the place of probating; and in § 3904, relating to the manner of probate in common given to records and judicial proceedings in the courts of any other state. Helm v. Rookesby, 1 Met. (Ky.) 49.

When a copy of a will is admitted to probate, in the absence of evidence sufficient to authorize a probate in this state under our laws, the presumption is that the authenticated copy was admitted to probate as a will of personality only. Dupoyster v. Gaganl, 84 Ky. 403, 1 S. W. 652. This was on the ground that "in order to entitle an authenticated copy of such will to be admitted to probate here as a will of real estate it must appear, from the transcript of the proceedings and judgment of the foreign court of probate, not only that said will was admitted to probate in the said court, but that the evidence heard there was sufficient to authorize our courts of probate to admit such will to record, had the same been offered for probate originally in our courts of probate." The court said that such court may then admit such copy as a will of real estate, and it may be admitted to probate according to the facts appearing in the transcript as a will of personality or as a will of realty, or of both, and, when the order admitting the copy to probate does so show, it will probably be conclusive until superseded or reversed.

A will probated in another state, proved by one witness, who does not prove the attestation of the other witness, and recorded in Kentucky, is of no effect as to real estate in Kentucky, under Ky. act 1842, 3 Stat. Law, 585, permitting such will to be recorded in the county where the real estate is, and giving the same effect as if it had been proved and recorded in that county, although it may be taken for granted that the will has been duly proved according to the laws of that state. Cornellson v. Browning, 10 B. Mon. 425.

Louisiana.

Where a certified copy of a will with the probate thereof from the county court of Tennessee is presented to the court of probate of Louisiana, and the copy of the will and probate is certified in conformity to the act of Congress May 20, 1790, prescribing the mode in which public records and judicial proceedings in a state shall be authenticated so as to take effect in another, the court of probate of Louisiana must admit the same for record. Lytle's Succession, 1 Rob. (La.) 268; Lally's Succession, 1 Rob. (La.) 269.

And where a will was made in Maryland and admitted to probate in Alabama, it should be admitted to probate in Louisiana, if the will had been proved and received by any court of 48 L. R. A.

competent jurisdiction, under La. Code, § 1882, providing for the execution of testaments made in other states and foreign countries without any other form than that of registering the testament, if it be established that the testament was duly proved before a competent judge of the place where it was received. State v. Iberville Probate Ct. Judge, 8 Mart. N. S. 586. In this case the court said that proof of execution would be required where this sanction has not been bestowed on them.

And in a suit in Louisiana, it was held that admitting a will of personality to probate in North Carolina is a judicial proceeding, and under the act of Congress the same faith and credit it had in the state from whence it came should be given to the record. Balfour v. Chew, 5 Mart. N. S. 517. In this case the court said that it lies on the defendant to show that it was improperly admitted to record. This he had not done, and if he had, so long as the judgment of that court by which it was ordered to be recorded stood unreversed, we could not refuse it effect here.

So, where a will was probated in Mississippi, and a copy of the will and of the record and probate thereof were admitted to record in the probate court of Louisiana, it must be taken for granted that the court of probate of Mississippi acted in conformity with the laws of that state, and that its judgment was rendered after due and legal proceedings. Jones v. Hunter, 6 Rob. (La.) 235.

And where the surrogate of Kings county, New York, rendered a decree in proceedings contradictorily taken between the executor of the will and next of kin, holding that the instrument purporting to be a last will and testament was purely and legally such, that particular fact must be taken in Louisiana as fixed by the judgment, and given effect to in Louisiana as established. Gaines's Succession, 45 La. Ann. 1237, 14 So. 233.

But a will should be refused probate in Louisiana where the certificate does not show in what manner the will was proved in Tennessee, nor what was the order of the court, under La. Code, art. 1882, providing that the order of execution shall be granted without any other form, if it be established that the testament has been duly proved before a competent judge of the place where it was received; otherwise the testament cannot be carried into effect without being first proved before the judge of whom the execution was demanded. Bowles's Succession, 3 Rob. (La.) 33. In this case the court said that the probate of a will is a judicial proceed-form; and in § 3910, relating to manner of probating contested wills; in short, whenever the proceeding is referred to in the statutes, the term used is "proving" the will, instead of "probating" it. The decisions of our court treat the terms as synonymous, and as meaning the process of proving or probating, and not the mere authentication. I am aware of no proceeding to prove a will that is not at the same time a probate of it, except in the case of soldiers' and sailors' wills, under § 3023, of Shannon's Compilation, which provides for the authentication by acknowledgment of the testator or proof by witnesses and a subsequent probate in the place of domicile, and this is the only section where the word "probate" is used instead of "proved." This, we think, then, means that while a will may be proved, as provided in that section, still it must be afterwards pro-bated in the domicile of the testator; and in such case the authentication is only prima facie evidence in case of contest. I do not think, therefore, that the sections of our statutes refer to wills which have been merely proven or authenticated, but to wills which have been proven in the sense of being probated. To hold differently will be to say that a will may be proven or authenticated in a foreign state, but not probated, and then, upon registration here, have all the effect of a probated will; or, in other words, that such foreign will may be made effective here, though never probated anywhere or in any jurisdiction. I do not think our statutes will bear this construction. If so, then such will need never be probated, but simply its execution proven, and, upon registration, it becomes a perfect will. It is tacitly conceded that a will of ing, and must be authenticated according to the act of Congress.

Maine.

If a will is executed and proved according to the laws of the other state, it will be valid if recorded here, although only two witnesses attested the will, as Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 12, provides for proving wills executed in another state, and § 13 provides that a will probated in another state may be allowed and recorded here after notice and hearing. Lyon v. Ogden, 85 Me. 374, 27 Atl. 258.

Maryland.

A decree of probate from another state in regard to lands in this state is of no effect. Dudd v. Brooke, 3 Gill, 198, 43 Am. Dec. 321; Darby v. Mayer, 10 Wheat. 465, 6 L. ed. 367.

See also Robertson v. Pickrell, 109 U. S. 608, 27 L. ed. 1049, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 407, as to District of Columbia, where a transcript from Virginia was offered as conclusive proof of the validity of the will and of all matters involved in its probate, and it was held that proof of a devise in ejectment in Maryland (its law obtains in the District) must be made by the production of the will in court, and evidence of its execution by the subscribing witness.

Massachusetts.

If a will be originally made, proved, and allowed in another state according to the laws thereof, and an authenticated copy of the proceedings be allowed and recorded in the probate court of Massachusetts, it then has the same effect upon any real estate there as if the will had been originally proved and allowed in Massachusetts. Parker v. Parker, 11 Cush. 519.

A decree of the probate court of another state, admitting to probate a will within its jurisdiction, is conclusive evidence, if duly authenticated, of the validity of the will, upon an application to prove it in Massachusetts, even when no notice of the offer of the will for probate was given, if by the law of that state no such notice was required, under Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 62, §§ 17-20, providing that a will proved in another state, with a probate thereof duly authenticated, may be presented to the probate court of this state, and after notice and hearing, if it shall appear that it ought to be allowed, it may be received in order to be recorded. Crippen v. Dexter, 13 Gray, 330. In this case the court said that this law gives the same force and effect to a foreign as to a domestic will, if made in conformity with the laws of the state where it was executed.

It was also said that when a copy of a will with an authenticated copy of the probate in another state is offered for probate in this state, the probate court must decide whether the record is duly authenticated, whether the court had jurisdiction to allow the will, and whether there is any estate in his county on which said will may operate; and perhaps it may be open, on inquiry, as to actual fraud in obtaining the probate of the will; but no opinion is expressed as to that. The court further said: "But as to all those facts which are necessary to the establishment of a will in whichever form the case is entertained, and as to the regularity of the proceedings and their conformity to the law of the state or country where they are had, the judgment itself must be held conclusive; it is required by the rule of the Constitution of the United States," and by the rule of common law.

In Babcock v. Collins, 60 Minn. 73, 61 N. W. 1020, it was said that the Minnesota statutes in regard to the probate of foreign wills are substantially the same as Mass. Rev. Stat. 1836, and that under such statute a Massachusetts court held that a foreign probate was conclusive in Crippen v. Dexter, 13 Gray, 332, and the court said: "It is not necessary here to decide whether or not this court would hold, as that court did in that case, that such foreign probate is conclusive, where the law of such foreign domicile required no notice of probate, and none was given."

Where a will is originally proved and allowed in New Hampshire according to the laws of such state, the filing and recording of a will in the probate court of Massachusetts in the manner prescribed by the statute is of the same force and effect as if the original had been proved and allowed here. But it was said that a will purporting to dispose of both real and personal estate, and not so attested and subscribed as to pass real estate, cannot be allowed as a testament of personal estate only. Dublin v. Chadbourn, 16 Mass. 433. In this case it was also said that, if a will was not attested as required by the laws of Massachusetts, objection may be made in the probate court of this state, and would have been sufficient to prevent the filing and recording of the will, although it was attested according to the laws of New Hampshire, where it was originally probated, as every objection to the validity of the will should be heard and determined in the course of the proceedings in the probate court of this state.

As to whether a will probated at the domicile of the testatrix in another state can be set aside real estate, probated in common form in the foreign court, may be contested in this state when it is presented for registration in this state where the land or a part of it lies; but the contention is that wills of personality stand upon a different basis, inasmuch as the law of the testator's domicile is supposed to affect the latter, but not the former, it being controlled by the law rei sitæ. This would lead, as we think, to inconsistent consequences. We will illustrate by a will which disposes of both lands and personal property in both a foreign state and in this state. It has been probated in a foreign state, and brought to this for registration. When offered here, parties interested proposed to contest it, and it is held they may do so as to realty, but not as to personality. We will suppose the ground of contest to be insanity. For that reason, the will as to the land may be set aside, but not as to personality. We will suppose the ground of the contest to be undue influence; the same result will follow. Or the ground may be revocation, and the result might be to set aside a will of realty, but the same act would not suffice to set aside the will of personality. The true doctrine is that the domicile fixes the personal status of the testator, and controls the disposition of property in that state, but not exclusively the place of probate. The domicile does not even fix the power or capacity to make a will absolutely, for this court has held that a will executed in a foreign state may be valid to pass real estate in this state, while it is invalid and of no force in the forum where it was executed. Carpenter v. Bell, 96 Tenn. 294, 34 S. W. 209. For these and other reasons I do not concur in the view of the majority.

in Massachusetts is questioned. Loring v. Oakley, 98 Mass. 287. Michigan.

In Re Mower, 48 Mich. 441, 12 N. W. 646, it was said that, for the purposes of administration and legal execution, wills probated in other states cannot be taken notice of in this state until they are probated here.

Under the New Jersey statute treating the record of a will with the proof thereof as the probate of the same, a transcript from that state, recorded in Michigan, shows a valid probate of the will, although there was no distinct separate judicial act or decree, as the judgment of the court establishing the will. Wilt v. Cutler, 38 Mich. 189.

Where an administrator objected to an executrix prosecuting a claim on the ground that the record of the appointment in this state did not show that the entire record of the Pennsylvania court was before the probate court in this state, and that the proceedings gave the executrix no standing, it was held that the proceedings allowing the will in this state sufficiently authorized her to prosecute the claim. Feustmann v. Gott, 65 Mich. 592, 32 N. W. 869. Minnesota.

A probate in another state is conclusive under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 47, § 18, providing that wills proved and allowed in any of the United States according to the law of such state may be allowed, filed, and recorded in this state, and § 19, providing that the court in this state shall appoint a time and place of hearing, and notice shall be given as in the case of an original will, and § 20, providing that if on the hearing it appears that the instrument ought to be allowed as a last will and testament, the copy shall have the same force and effect as if it had been originally proved. It was also held that, under Minn. Laws 1870, chap. 64, amending § 21, providing for the issue of letters testamentary to a foreign executor, the foreign probate was conclusive, and the right of the foreign executor to appointment here was also conclusive. Babcock v. Collins, 60 Minn. 73, 61 N. W. 1020. In this case it was said that it is not necessary to decide whether such probate would be held conclusive if the law of the other state allowed a probate of a will without notice.

In Re Southard, 48 Minn. 37, 50 N. W. 932, it was said that Minn. Probate Code, Laws 1889, chap. 46, §§ 32-34, allowing the filing here of wills which have been admitted to probate and established in some other state or country, is intended to make such wills effectual and operative here, as though they had been originally admitted to probate and established by original proof in our own courts.

But a will probated in another state does not affect land until proved and allowed in this state. Pott v. Pennington, 16 Minn. 509, Gil. 460.

With reference to foreign wills executed according to the laws of this state, Minn. Probate Code, chap. 2, § 32, Laws 1889, chap. 46, is merely cumulative as to the mode of proving or making certified copies of it after probate in another state sufficient evidence to establish the will. Putnam v. Pitney, 45 Minn. 242, 11 L. R. A. 41, 47 N. W. 790. Mississippi.

The probate of a will of personal property at the testator's domicile will be held valid in this state. Montgomery v. Millikin, 5 Smedes & M. 131, 43 Am. Dec. 507.

The probate of a will in another state is valid as to property in that state. Wells v. Wells, 35 Miss. 638.

And where an authenticated copy of a will and probate from Alabama was ordered to be admitted to probate and recorded in Mississippi, it was held that that act was clearly within the jurisdiction of the court, and it cannot be collaterally impeached, even if the court acted erroneously in its judgment as to the sufficiency of the original probate in Alabama. Crusoe v. Butler, 36 Miss. 150. In this case it was held to be no objection to the record of a probate in Mississippi on an authenticated copy of a probate from Alabama that the will appeared to have been probated there by but one of three subscribing witnesses. This showed sufficient proof of the will. The court said that if the record states that it was duly proved by one of them, and admitted to probate, and it does not affirmatively appear that the witness proved only the attestation by himself and execution in his presence, it will be presumed that he testified to every fact necessary to the due execution.

In Melvin v. Lyons, 10 Smedes & M. 78, where it was held that a copy of a will duly probated in another state was admissible in evidence in Mississippi, it was said that Miss. Stat. H. & H. 388, § 13, providing that authenticated copies of wills proved in other states may be offered for and admitted to probate in this state subject to be contested and controverted as the original might be, was not designed to establish a rule for the admissibility of a copy in evidence, for if so, it would be contrary to the act of Congress.

The probate of a will in Alabama, and of an authenticated copy thereof afterward in this state, had only such effect here as allowed by our laws. This was sufficient to have enabled the executor, without qualifying as executor in this state, to execute the special power conferred upon him by the will to sell the land; but it was not enough to enable him, as executor, to recover in ejectment, as he must qualify as such in this state before he is entitled to the possession of real estate. Sims v. Hodges, 65 Miss. 211, 3 So. 457.

The probate in another state is of no force as to property here if the testator was domiciled here at the time of his death. Sturdivant v. Neill, 27 Miss. 157; Wells v. Wells, 35 Miss. 638; Morris v. Morris, 27 Miss. 847; Bate v. Incisa, 59 Miss. 513.

In Sturdivant v. Neill, 27 Miss. 157, it was said that Miss. Stat. 1821, Hutch. Code, 605, providing that authenticated copies of wills proved according to the laws of any of the United States, touching estates within this state, may be offered and admitted to probate in this state,—merely permits our courts to receive the authenticated copy as evidence of the due execution of the will, because the question has already been decided by a court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and whose judgment was based upon the law of its own country, in determining the validity of the will; and, if it had no jurisdiction or power to make the record, the courts of this state can take no jurisdiction of a copy of such record. Our courts "make but one inquiry, and that is as to the jurisdiction of the foreign tribunal which pronounced the judgment, which, if valid according to the foreign law, will be equally so in this state, unless it be shown that the foreign law so far conflicts with our policy as to relieve our courts from giving to it any operation within the limits of the state." Missouri.

The probate of a will in another state is to be regarded as a judicial proceeding, to the record of which full faith and credit are to be given as evidence when certified conformably to the act of Congress of 1790. Halle v. Hill, 13 Mo. 612.

And Wagner's (Mo.) Stat. p. 1369, § 34, authorizing the record of an authenticated copy of a foreign will and making a copy of such recorded exemplification evidence, does not repeal Wagner's Stat. p. 598, § 51, providing that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of the United States, or any state, when properly authenticated, shall have such faith and credit given to them in this state as they would have at the place whence they came. Full faith and credit are to be given to the probate of a foreign will when certified to in conformity to act of Congress. Lewis v. St. Louis, 69 Mo. 595, affirming 3 Mo. App. 582; Bradstreet v. Kinsella, 76 Mo. 68.

And where a will was executed in Kentucky according to the laws of Missouri, and probated in Kentucky, and an authenticated copy of such record was recorded in Missouri, a copy of this last record was conclusive, and needed no support for proving the will. Applegate v. Smith, 31 Mo. 166.

But persons dealing with land located in this state are not charged with constructive notice of a foreign will until it is either proved anew in this state, or until a copy of the will and for eign probate is recorded here as permitted to be done by our statutes. Graves v. Ewart, 99 Mo. 13, 11 S. W. 971; Van Syckle v. Beam, 110 Mo. 589, 19 S. W. 946.

In regard to constructive notice of an unrecorded will that has been probated in another state, it was said: "When the Kentucky court admitted this will to probate it adjudged it to be executed according to the laws of that state, and we accept that adjudication as conclusive upon that subject; but it did not undertake to say that the will transmitted the title to the Missouri land. That court did not assume to make any such adjudication. The probate of the will, then, does not have the credit in that state of affecting the title to land in this state, and hence we are not called upon to give it a credit here that it does not have in the courts of the state where the probate is declared." Keith v. Keith, 97 Mo. 224, 10 S. W. 597. In this case it was said that a will, to be of any validity as a transfer of title to land, must be executed, attested, and probated in the manner prescribed by the law of the state where the land is located.

And a probate in another state is invalid where the domicile of the testator was in this state at the time of his death. Nat v. Coons, 10 Mo. 543; Stewart v. Pettus, 10 Mo. 755. Nebraska.

It is not necessary that an original will shall be presented to, or filed with, a county court in this state for probate in case of foreign wills, as Neb. Comp. Stat. 1891, chap. 23, § 145, provides for presenting a copy of a foreign will and probate duly authenticated, and § 146 provides that if the instrument ought to be allowed, a copy shall be filed and recorded, and the will shall have the same effect as if originally proved in the same court. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Setright, 34 Neb. 253, 51 N. W. 833.

In Roberts v. Flanagan, 21 Neb. 503, 32 N. W. 563, it was said that a decree of another state probating a will might be held invalid in a direct attack.

New Hampshire.

A certified probate from another state cannot be filed in the court of probate if the domicile of the deceased was in this state at the time of her death. Stark v. Parker, 56 N. H. 481.

A copy of a will executed and proved according to the laws of Pennsylvania may be filed and recorded in the probate court of New Hampshire, although the will is not executed according to the laws of New Hampshire in that the execution was in the presence of only two witnesses, under N. H. Gen. Laws, chap. 194, § 12, permitting the copy of a will with its probate made in another state to be filed, to be executed according to the laws of the state where the probate of the original will has been made. Kennard v. Kennard, 68 N. H. 303.

New Jersey.

A probate from another state may be contested where the testator was domiciled here at the time of his death. Wallace v. Wallace, 8 N. J. Eq. 618.

And the probate of a will allowed in another state may be refused by the surrogate. Allaire v. Allaire, 37 N. J. L. 312.

So, the probate of a will in California not executed by the testator in the presence of subscribing witnesses, that is a valid testamentary disposition of lands under the laws of that state, is of no effect in New Jersey, under N. J. Rev. p. 1247, § 22, requiring all wills to be executed in the presence of two witnesses who should subscribe their names in the presence of the testator; and this defect is not cured by N. J. act 1852, Pub. Laws 112, and act May 11, 1886, Rev. Supp. 775, authorizing the recording of wills probated in another state. Nelson v. Potter, 50 N. J. L. 324, 15 Atl. 875.

When a will is probated in another state, and an exemplified record is used in New Jersey to make title to lands, the record exemplified from such other state must contain the proofs there made upon the probate, so that it may appear that the will was made and executed with the formalities prescribed by the statute of New Jersey for devises of lands. Lindley v. O'Reilly, 50 N. J. L. 636, 1 L. R. A. 79, 15 Atl. 379.

In this case it was said: "The probate of a will is a judicial act to be proved by a sworn or duly certified copy of the record, or at least by the certificate of the officer before whom the probate is made. And where the object of making such a will a record in this state is for the purpose of making title to lands, the record exemplified from another state must contain the proofs taken upon the probate, that it may appear by such proofs that the will was made and executed in the manner and with the formalities prescribed by the statute of this state for devises of lands."

New York.

Code of Civil Procedure, § 2611, provides that a will of real or personal property executed as prescribed by the law of the state, and a will of personal property executed without the state and within the United States as prescribed by the laws of the state where it is or was executed, or a will of personal property executed by a person not a resident of the state, according to the laws of the testator's residence, may be proved as prescribed in this article. The validity of its execution is not affected by a change of the testator's residence made since the execution of the will, and applies only to wills made after April 11, 1876.

Section 2694 provides that the validity of a will of real property in this state is regulated by the laws of the state without regard to the residence of the decedent.

Section 2695 provides that where a will of personal property, made by a person who resided out of the state at the time of its execution or at the time of his death, has been admitted to probate within the state where it was executed and where the testator resided at the time of his death, the surrogate must record the will and issue ancillary letters.

Section 2703 provides that where real property in this state is devised or made subject to a power of disposition by a will duly executed in conformity with the laws of this state, of a person who was, at the time of his death, a resident elsewhere within the United States, and such will has been admitted to probate within any state of the United States, and is filed and recorded in the proper office of that state, a copy of such will, or the record, and of the proofs or of the record thereof, or, if the proofs are not on file or recorded, of any statement on file or recorded of the substance of the proofs authenticated, or, if no proofs be on file, a copy of such will or the record authenticated, etc., may be recorded in the office of the surrogate of any county where such real property is situated, and such record shall be presumptive evidence of such will and of the execution thereof in any action relating to such real property.

In order to justify the recording of a will of real property, the proof taken on the foreign probate must show that the will was executed according to the laws of this state, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2703; Re Langbein, 1 Dem. 448; Shearer's Estate, 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 455.

So under N. Y. Laws 1864, chap. 811, as amended by Laws 1872, chap. 680, providing as Code Civ. Proc. § 2703, supra, the exemplified record of the probate of a foreign will is only presumptive evidence of the will and of its due execution, and if the will has not been executed so as to comply with the laws of this state in reference to the transmission of real estate, the presumption is overcome and no longer exists. Lockwood v. Lockwood, 51 Hun, 337, 2 L. R. A. 425, 3 N. Y. Supp. 887, Affirming 2 N. Y. Supp. 224.

When a certified copy of a probate in another state is recorded in this state, it is of the same effect as a domestic will. Bromley v. Miller, 2 Thomp. & C. 575.

In Taylor v. Syme, 17 App. Div. 517, 45 N. Y. Supp. 707, where the deceased at the time of her death resided in Alabama, and the will executed in Alabama was duly probated in Louisiana, where the deceased left real estate, and upon this letters were issued in New York, it was contended that under Code Civ. Proc. § 2695, ancillary letters can only be granted upon a foreign will, where such will has been admitted to probate within a foreign country or within the state or territory of the United States where it was executed, or where the testator resided at the time of his death. It was held that the action of the surrogate in New York could not be attacked in an action brought by the executor on notes due the estate.

And a decree of another state refusing the probate of a will is not conclusive in this state. Re Gaines, 84 Hun, 520, 32 N. Y. Supp. 398, Affirmed in 154 N. Y. 747.

Where a will was probated in California, and ancillary letters granted in New York, and subsequently the letters were revoked in California on a contest, and the executor removed, the surrogate in New York should also have revoked the ancillary letters and granted new ancillary letters to the administrator with the will annexed, without notice to the executor. Re Gillern, 50 Hun, 399, 3 N. Y. Supp. 145.

On an application by an executor from another state to set aside letters of administration and to obtain ancillary letters testamentary, it was held that if the next of kin were not parties to the proceedings to admit the will to probate in New Jersey, the letters of administration would not be disturbed until proceedings were instituted in this state to admit the letters to probate, if the testatrix resided in this state at the time of her death or of the execution of the will, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2695; Gavin's Estate, 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 390, 2 N. Y. Supp. 670.

Where an application was made for ancillary letters under a will proved in the court of another state by whose laws wills are admitted by the oral direction of the court without any written "judgment, decree, or orders," such laws must be shown. Re Hudson, 5 Redf. 333.

In Pollock v. Hooley, 67 Hun, 370, 22 N. Y. Supp. 215, it was said that under Code Civ. Proc. § 2703, there is no provision for issuing letters testamentary upon a will of realty; but it was the intention of the legislature that the existence of a power to sell should be evidenced by the record here, and whether the donee had qualified himself to exercise it is to be determined by what had been done at the place of the probate of the will.

In Clark v. Poor, 73 Hun, 143, 25 N. Y. Supp. 908, a will had been probated in Connecticut, where the testator resided, having real and personal property there and also in New York, and the executor brought an action to have the will probated in New York. It was held that his complaint stated no cause of action, as it alleged that the will had been duly probated in Connecticut where the testator resided and died. Such probate had not been questioned, and N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1861, providing for proving a will, does not apply to wills that have been proved in another state. The court said that Code Civ. Proc. art. 7, title 3, chap. 18 (§§ 2695-2704), provide for establishing and giving effect in this state to a will duly probated in other states.

In Alexander's Will, 1 Tucker, 114, it was held that an exemplified copy of a will, executed conformably to the lex loci, by a citizen of this state temporarily absent therefrom, cannot be received by the surrogate. The original will is required. The court said: "It is true that it results, from this construction of our law, that a valid will of personalty within our state may be made by a noncitizen wherever he may chance to be, by executing it according to the law of his state, and that such a will may be proved here by producing a copy; while the will of a citizen of our state, made abroad, can only be proved by producing the original; but I have nothing to do with the wisdom or justice of the law, being confined to the duty of declaring it."

New York Code Civ. Proc. § 2611, changes the law in regard to wills executed out of this state.

North Carolina.

A will probated in another state, and executed according to the laws of this state, and properly certified, is valid. Roscoe v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. 124 N. C. 42, 32 S. E. 889.

In Ward v. Hearne, 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 184, it was said that under N. C. act 1844, chap. 88, § 6, providing that when any will made by a citizen of another state shall have been duly proved or allowed in such state according to the laws thereof, a copy or exemplification of such will, duly authenticated when produced before the court of pleas and quarter sessions of any county of the state where any property is situated, shall be by said court allowed and recorded, and the like effect be given to said will as if the original had been produced and allowed; the county court before whom the copy is exhibited are the judge of its authentication, and when they allow it, it is their judgment, and, if not appealed from, that judgment is conclusive upon all other tribunals until properly reversed.

When the probate of a will has been obtained in another state and is authenticated as the law of the United States directs, it supersedes the necessity of a probate in the courts of this state, so that the executor may maintain a suit thereon in this state. Stephens v. Smart, 4 N. C. (1 Car. Law Repos.) 471; Lancaster v. McBryde, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 421.

And the same was said to be the rule in Hyman v. Gaskins, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 287.

Ohio.
A decree of probate from another state as to personalty is invalid if the will is not executed according to the law of this state, and if the testator was domiciled here at the time of his death. Manuel v. Manuel, 13 Ohio St. 458.

A will attested by witnesses, which was valid in Virginia and probated there, was improperly admitted to record in Ohio, where two witnesses were required in order to affect real property, under Ohio act February 18, 1831, § 14, providing that authenticated copies of wills proved according to the laws of any state or territory within the United States relative to any property within this state may be admitted to record by the court aforesaid in the county where such property shall be, and such authenticated copies shall be good and valid in law in like manner as wills made in this state are declared to be. Bailey v. Bailey, 8 Ohio, 230.

Under this statute a will was improperly admitted to record although valid in Pennsylvania, where there was no subscribing witness. The 48 L. R. A.

order of probate was annulled. Meese v. Keefe, 10 Ohio, 862.

Where an alleged will relating to lands in Ohio, without witnesses, and inoperative to affect property in Ohio, was probated in Virginia, and an authenticated copy of its probate in Virginia admitted to record in Ohio, it could be impeached in a suit regularly instituted for that purpose. Jones v. Robinson, 17 Ohio St. 171.

In a proceeding to record a decree of probate from another state adverse steps may be taken. Re Barr, 30 Ohio L. J. 386.

Where a transcript of a probate of a will in Virginia was admitted to record in Ohio, and the attestation clause on the face of the will was "signed, sealed, and attested in the presence," and the record showed that the writing was proved by oaths of two of the subscribing witnesses to be the last will of the deceased, the import of this attestation clause is that the testator and witnesses signed the instrument in the presence of each other and independent of the record of probate, which affords a presumption that all the signatures were affixed at the same time and place. Carpenter v. De-noon, 29 Ohio St. 379.

In Hall v. Ashby, 9 Ohio, 96, 34 Am. Dec. 424, it was said that the record of a foreign will is not intended to give publicity to the proof of it, nor to give notice of the title acquired under it. It is to permit a copy to be given in evidence when it would be difficult or impossible to produce the original. In Ohio the probate relates to both reality and personalty, and the record which is consequent upon the probate enables a copy to be given in evidence whenever a controversy arises concerning property devised.

Pennsylvania.

After a register pronounces a foreign will approved he does a judicial act, and it cannot be attacked collaterally. Lovett v. Mathews, 24 Pa. 330.

So, where a will was duly admitted to probate in New Jersey, and the executor obtained ancillary letters from the register in Pennsylvania, the testator having property within this commonwealth, it was held that the court in Pennsylvania had no jurisdiction to determine the validity of the will, and that the petitioner should seek her remedy in the courts of the domicile. Mackin's Estate, 14 Phila. 328.

Rhode Island.

The probate of a will in another state is only prima facie evidence of its validity. Bowen v. Johnson, 5 R. I. 112, 73 Am. Dec. 49.

Where a legatee brought an action in Rhode Island, under a will probated in Wisconsin, it was held that the effect of a decree proving a will, like that of a decree granting administration, is confined de jure to the territory, and things within the territory, of the state setting up the court, and such decrees are decrees in rem, passed by courts deriving all their authority from the state which institutes them, and necessarily, in great part, upon constructive notice only to those interested in the decrees; and it is difficult to see how a wider operation could be allowed to them, consistently with a just attention to the claims to the property of the decedent, of citizens of other states in which the property was at the time of his death. Whatever operation is allowed to them is a mere matter of comity. Olney v. Angell, 5 R. I. 198, 73 Am. Dec. 62.

Tennessee.

If a will of personal property is probated at the testator's domicile, it cannot be contested here. MARTIN V. STOVALL; Williams v. Saunders, 5 Coldw. 60.

And a will probated in another state, executed according to the laws of this state, is valid for the purpose of passing land. Bieldorn v. Pilot Mountain Coal & Min. Co. 89 Tenn. 166, 15 S. W. 737; Smith v. Neilson, 13 Lea, 461.

Texas.

The probate from another state has no validity until recorded. Slayton v. Singleton, 72 Tex. 209, 9 S. W. 876; Welder v. McComb, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 85, 30 S. W. 822; Mills v. Herndon, 60 Tex. 353.

In Poole v. Jackson, 66 Tex. 380, 1 S. W. 75, it was said that "our laws do not leave open to contest a will which has been probated in another state. The question of its execution is res judicata. The proof of its execution is not preserved in our courts. That it has been admitted to probate by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter is all that we require. Hence a copy of the will and its probate abroad is all that is to be recorded."

It is not necessary, in offering for record a will probated in another state, to prove that it was legally probated in such other state. Houze v. Houze, 16 Tex. 598.

In this case the court said that proceedings of foreign courts of probate are judicial proceedings which may be authenticated under the act of Congress, and the proceedings thus authenticated are presumed to have been by competent authority and in conformity to the local law, and the records are evidence, not only of the acts of the court, but of its jurisdiction.

In Paschal v. Acklin, 27 Tex. 192, it was said that on an application for the probate of a will here that has been probated in another state, its execution need not be proved; and the only order that the court can make with reference to it is that it should be "died and recorded." Hart's Dig. art. 1114.

In Acklin v. Paschal, 48 Tex. 147, it was said: "When this case was formerly before this court it was held that under the admissions of the parties the will was before the court as if properly probated (and we understand this to mean probated in this state), and the opinion was expressed that to question its validity in this suit would be to attack the will in a collateral proceeding. We are satisfied with these conclusions. . . . The action of the courts of another state in setting aside the will as to real estate and slaves in that state because in violation of their statutes was not designed to affect, and certainly could not affect, the validity of the will as to real estate in Texas, the will standing as having been probated here."

In Holman v. Hopkins, 27 Tex. 38, it is said that it is well settled that the law of the place of the actual domicile is to govern testator's testamentary disposition of his personal property, wherever it may be situated. But as to real property the law of the place where land is situated governs, not only as to the capacity of the testator and the extent of his power to dispose of the property, but also as to the forms and solemnities necessary to give to the will its due attestation and effect.

Vermont.

A will of personal property, made in Indiana, cannot be contested in Vermont on offering an authenticated copy for record on the ground of incapacity or undue influence, if the will is executed according to the laws of Indiana, under Vt. Rev. Laws, § 2057, providing that a will made out of the state, which might be proved and allowed by the laws of the state in which it was made, may be proved, allowed, and recorded in this state, and shall then have the same effect as if executed according to the laws of this state. Ives v. Salisbury, 56 Vt. 568.

And a decree of the probate court of Vermont admitting a will to probate on an authenticated record of probate in New York cannot be assailed in Vermont in a collateral manner. Townsend v. Downer, 32 Vt. 183.

But a will probated in another state cannot affect property in this state until proved and allowed. Walton v. Hall, 66 Vt. 455, 29 Atl. 803.

In Ives v. Allyn, 12 Vt. 589, it was said that notice is to be given to all persons concerned, to appear and contest the probate or filing and recording, and when recorded the copy thus proved and allowed in another state, recorded here, has the same effect as the probate of an original will, under Vt. Stat. 1797, providing that a will executed, proved, and allowed in any probate court of the United States may, after due notice, be filed and recorded in a probate court in this state, and then have the same effect as the probate of an original will, and act 1804 and act 1821, requiring such copies to be recorded in the probate office and in the town clerk's office.

Virginia.

A decree of probate from another state may be contested here. Ex parte Povall, 3 Leigh, 816.

And a will may be probated in this state notwithstanding the refusal of probate in another state on account of incapacity of the testator. Rice v. Jones, 4 Call (Va.) 89.

West Virginia.

A probate from another state is not conclusive. Thrasher v. Ballard, 33 W. Va. 285, 10 S. E. 411.

Wisconsin.

The validity of every devise or disposition of real estate by will must be governed by the law of the place where the land is situated, and this includes, not only the form and mode of the execution of the will, but also the lawful power and authority of the testator to make such disposition. Ford v. Ford, 70 Wis. 19, 33 N. W. 188.

An exemplified record of the probate of a will in New York, presented to the county court in Wisconsin on due notice given, as in the case of an original will presented for probate, and the instrument allowed by judgment in due form and a copy duly recorded, has the same effect as though it had been originally proved and allowed in Wisconsin, under Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 97, §§ 22-24, providing that wills duly proved and allowed in any other state according to the laws of such state may be allowed, filed, and recorded in the county court of any county in which the testator shall have real or personal estate, on notice to be given of time and place of hearing; and if it shall appear that the instrument ought to be allowed in this state, a copy shall be filed and recorded, and shall have the same effect as if the will had been originally proved and allowed in the same court. Markwell v. Thorn, 28 Wis. 548.

In Hayes v. Lienloken, 48 Wis. 509, 4 N. W. 584, it was said that Wis. Rev. Stat. § 2295, providing as above, supersedes the necessity of proving anew a foreign will by making the record of a duly certified copy operate as an original probate. But that where a mortgage has been foreclosed by a foreign executor in this state, such record is not sufficient to show the death of the testator and the official character of the person who assumed the right to foreclose the mortgage upon advertisement in this state.

In conclusion it may be said that, in the absence of statutory provisions respecting wills probated in other states, such probate is conclusive as to personal property if probated at the domicile of the testator; that in regard to real estate the will must be executed and proved according to the place where the real estate is situated, in order to have any effect. The general presumption is that the decree is valid, and that the court had jurisdiction. In a contest on offering a will for record probated in another state, or in regard to real estate, where it has not been recorded, the Federal Constitution, providing full faith and credit, etc., is generally held not to apply to probate of wills except in matters of evidence, and does not conclude questions as to jurisdiction, or that a will of real estate has not been executed in accordance with the law of the place where the real estate is situated. These general observations are largely affected, however, by local statutes which must be looked into in order to ascertain the law of the state.

Cases in regard to authentication of wills, or in regard to mere matters of evidence, or as to the construction of wills, are not intended to be included in this note.

Reference is made to the case of Sly v. Hunt (Mass.) 21 L. R. A. 680, note, as to "Conclusiveness of probate as res judicata." I. T.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Re Conrad YOUNG.

(.....Or.....)

A state statute making it an offense to solicit a seaman to desert from any vessel within the jurisdiction of the state is not in violation of U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, subd. 3, as a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce, in the absence of any act of Congress repugnant thereto.

(January 15, 1900.)

APPPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County discharging petitioner from the custody of William Frazier, sheriff, to which he had been committed under an indictment charging him with enticing a seaman from his vessel. Reversed.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This is a special proceeding by Conrad Young against William Frazier, as sheriff of Multnomah county, to have the cause of his imprisonment inquired into, and to be relieved therefrom. The transcript shows that Young was indicted by the grand jury of said county for the crime of enticing one William Schrike, a seaman employed on the German ship Peru, to desert therefrom, and upon being arraigned was allowed until the next day to plead, whereupon he immediately sued out, in another department of said court, a writ of habeas corpus, which was served upon the defendant, who, for his return, certified that he held plaintiff, by virtue of an order of said court, to answer the indictment returned against him. Upon this issue a trial was had, resulting in Young's discharge, and the state appeals.

Messrs. C. M. Idleman and Charles F. Lord, for appellant:

It appearing that the defendant was held by virtue of a commitment duly issued upon an indictment regularly returned into court, it was the duty of the judge to remand the prisoner.

Oregon Code, § 621, subd. 2, § 608, subd. 2; Re Winder, 2 Cliff. 89, Fed. Cas. No. 17,867.

NOTE.—On the question of the liability of a third party for inducing a breach of contract, see Boysen v. Thorn (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 233, and note; Raycroft v. Tayntor (Vt.) 38 L. R. A. 48 L. R. A.

One department of a court will not interfere with business pending before another department of that court.

Re Strickland, 41 La. Ann. 324, 6 So. 577.

One court will not issue a writ of habeas corpus to admit the prisoner to bail, where the application for bail is pending in another court.

Ex parte Kittrel, 20 Ark. 499.

Where the commitment is regular upon its face, the presumption is in favor of the legality of such imprisonment.

The grant of commercial power to Congress does not contain any terms which expressly exclude the states from exercising an authority over its subject-matter. If they are excluded it must be because the nature of the power thus granted to Congress requires that a similar authority should not exist in the states.

Mr. D. R. N. Blackburn, also for appellant:

Even if Congress had been authorized to prescribe a punishment for this offense, and had actually done so, this would not take away the right of the state to create this offense and provide a punishment.

So far as crimes and their punishment on water are concerned, the power of Congress seems to be limited to "piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations."

Mr. Henry E. McGinn for respondent.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal is whether the statute under which Young was indicted is violative of subdiv. 3, art. 1, § 8, of the Constitution of the United States, as being an attempt on the part of the legislative assembly to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The act under consideration reads as follows: "If any person or persons shall entice, persuade, or by any means attempt to persuade, any seaman to desert from, or, without permission of the officer then in command thereof, to leave or depart therefrom, either temporarily or otherwise, any ship or steamer or other vessel while such ship, steamer, or other vessel is within the waters under the jurisdiction of this state or within the waters of the concurrent jurisdiction of this state and the territory of Washington, such person or persons shall, upon conviction thereof before any justice of the peace, or before a circuit court of this state, be punished," etc. Hill's Anno. Laws (Or.) § 1952. Notwithstanding Congress possesses power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, each state has retained a sufficient measure of power to enable it to enforce its internal police regulations, in the exercise of which it can establish and regulate ferries across its navigable rivers, control the moving of vessels in harbors within its borders, and enact health and inspection laws, which, by quarantine or otherwise, may operate on persons brought within its jurisdiction in the course of commercial operation. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 712; King v. American Transp. Co. 1 Flipp. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 7,787. Thus, a vessel owned by a citizen of Pennsylvania, and licensed under the laws of the United States to be employed in the coasting and fishing trade, was seized and condemned under a statute of Maryland making it unlawful to take oysters within the waters of the latter state with a scoop or drag, and prescribing as a penalty for a violation thereof the forfeiture of the vessel so offending; and it was held that the act in question was a proper exercise of the internal police power of a state, which was not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 269. It is only when a statute of a state conflicts with an act of Congress regulating foreign or interstate commerce, or contravenes the general policy of the government, that it must yield. As was said by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23: "The nullity of any act inconsistent with the Constitution is produced by the declaration that the Constitution is the supreme law. The appropriate application of that part of the clause which confers the same supremacy on laws and treaties is to such acts of the state legislatures as do not transcend their powers, but, though enacted in the execution of acknowledged state powers, interfere with or are contrary to the laws of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution, or some treaty made under the authority of the United States. In every such case the act of Congress or the treaty is supreme, and the law of the state, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it." Congress has prescribed a punishment for any person who shall harbor or secrete a seaman belonging to any vessel, knowing him to belong thereto. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4601. In construing this section it has been repeatedly held, however, that the penalty therein prescribed does not apply to the harboring or secreting of any person employed as a seaman on a vessel which does not belong to a citizen of the United States. Ex parte D'Oliviera, 1 Gall. 474, Fed. Cas. No. 3,987; United States v. Minges, 16 Fed. Rep. 657; Grant v. United States, 15 U. S. App. 243, 58 Fed. Rep. 694, 7 C. C. A. 436. But, if it were held that this section applied with equal force to seamen employed on a foreign vessel, § 1952, Hill's Anno. Laws (Or.), not being repugnant thereto or inconsistent therewith, is enforceable in the courts of this state; the rule being that the statute of a state and an act of Congress may each prohibit the commission of the same offense, and prescribe the same or a different punishment therefor, under which the party found guilty thereof may suffer the penalties provided by the laws of the United States and of the state. Territory v. Coleman, 1 Or. 192; State v. Brown, 2 Or. 221; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 410, 12 L. ed. 213; United States v. Marigold, 9 How. 560, 13 L. ed. 257; Moore v. Illinois, 14 How. 13, 14 L. ed. 306; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717; Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131, 33 L. ed. 287, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 47. If the statute under consideration be deemed a regulation of commerce, it is local in its application and limited in its operation; and, Congress not having assumed control of the subject thereof, it is within the power of the state to prescribe the necessary regulations. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 29 L. ed. 158, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091. The act in question is a rightful exercise of the police power of the state, in the regulation of the matters to which it applies; and instead of being in conflict with any regulation of Congress upon the subject, or in contravention of the general policy of the government, it is in fact in aid of commerce rather than in restriction of it. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U.

S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 40 L. ed. 1105, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 934; Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 41 L. ed. 166, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1086; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 41 L. ed. 853, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Gladson v. Minnesota, 166 U. S. 427, 41 L. ed. 1064, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 627; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Solan, 169 U. S. 133, 42 L. ed. 688, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 289.

The court having erred in discharging the plaintiff, it follows that the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to have him apprehended, and to require him to plead to the indictment.

Maria ECKER, Respt.,
v.

G. A. LINDSKOG, Appt.

1. A selection of the exempted property which is allowed to the head of a family by the Constitution and Laws of 1890, chap. 86, may be made by the wife when the husband is incompetent to make it because he has been adjudged insane and is confined in a state hospital, although most of the property claimed belongs to him.
2. The fact that a wife claims to be the owner of exempt property, the greater portion of which belongs to her insane husband, will not defeat her claim of exemption set up thereto by her as the head of a family, if no injury results from the failure to state the particulars as to the title.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brookings County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain property seized by defendant under execution, as being exempt to plaintiff as the head of a family. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cheever & Hall, for appellant:

The burden was upon the plaintiff, in order to establish a prima facie case, to prove: (1) That she was the owner of the property; (2) that she was the head of the family; and (3) the claim of, and right to, exemptions.

If the property belongs to Joseph it is not exempt, and is therefore subject to the execution against him, and plaintiff could not recover.

The answer raising the issue of her ownership, it was necessary for her to establish the same.

Fuller, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action in claim and delivery, to recover from the sheriff certain personal property upon which he had levied executions, and of which plaintiff, in her complaint, claims to be owner, resulted in her favor, and the defendant appeals. The value of the property seized, consisting mainly of farm horses, with their harnesses, and a wagon, together with all personal property enumerated in her schedule of exemptions, does not exceed the amount allowed by law to the head of the family; and the ownership of such property, and her right to claim the same as exempt, are the only points that need be considered.

One execution is upon a judgment against respondent and her husband jointly, and the other upon a judgment against her alone; and within the time allowed by law she claimed her exemptions, by serving upon appellant a schedule of all the property belonging to both herself and husband, including that seized, and notified him of the appointment of an appraiser to act in her behalf, and an appraisement was demanded. In this verified schedule of personal property, respondent states that the same belongs to herself and husband, Joseph Ecker, and "is exempt from levy and sale on execution, and affiant hereby claims the same as exempt from levy and sale, upon the ground that the value of the same, and of the whole thereof, does not exceed the sum of $750; that affiant is the wife of said defendant, Joseph Ecker, and has been his wife for the period of several years past; that said Joseph Ecker has been adjudged insane by the board of insanity of said Brookings county in the year 1896, and was committed by the judge of the county court of said county of Brookings to the hospital for the insane at Yankton, in said state of South Dakota, where he is still confined." Her schedule and demand for an appraisement were wholly disregarded by appellant, and the failure to comply with the following is the only reason assigned for his refusal to have the property appraised. "To Maria Ecker: You are hereby demanded to furnish me forthwith a statement of property included in the schedule of yours, dated September 24th, 1897, served upon me in the case of N. A. Schouweiler and M. E. Schouweiler, copartners as Schouweiler Bros., against Joseph Ecker and Maria Ecker, showing which articles of personal property you claim to belong to yourself, and which you claim to belong to Joseph Ecker separately; and also, in such statement, you inform me whether you claim you are the head of the family of 'Joseph Ecker.'" We think the ownership was sufficiently stated, together with facts justifying a reasonable inference that respondent based her exemption right upon the claim that she was the head of the family of Joseph Ecker; and it was appellant's duty to pursue statutory steps to determine whether such property, or any part thereof, was so exempt. Holdridge v. Lee, 3 S. D. 134, 52 N. W. 265; Paddock v. Balgord, 2 S. D. 100, 48 N. W. 840. When the 48 L. R. A.

head of the family, rightfully in possession of personal property, claims the same as exempt, although informally, and no waiver of such claim has been made, it is the duty of the sheriff to whom the schedule has been submitted to have such property appraised, although the husband or wife of such debtor may own some interest therein. It has been held that exempt personal property, confessedly owned by the debtor's wife, but seized for his debts, may be recovered by him from the grasp of his creditors, by reason of a mere possessory right. Steen v. Hamblet, 66 Miss. 112, 5 So. 524; Braswell v. McDaniel, 74 Ga. 319. In Minnesota "a disclaimer by the debtor of any ownership of the property levied on will not estop him from afterwards asserting and proving his title thereto as owner, when the disclaimer has not influenced the conduct of the officer, or been acted on by him or the plaintiff in the execution." Moade v. Thompson, 27 Minn. 134, 6 N. W. 479. It is undisputed that respondent, with her children, occupied a rented farm, and has by the use of the property seized maintained the family during the two years of her husband's affliction and detention in the hospital for the insane; and she must therefore, in contemplation of the statute, be regarded as the head of the family. State ex rel. Lucas v. Houck, 32 Neb. 525, 49 N. W. 462; Frazier v. Syas, 10 Neb. 115, 35 Am. Rep. 460, 4 N. W. 934. The property claimed being exempt, the wife, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, had the right to demand it for herself and family; and, in the absence of any injury resulting therefrom, the fact that she claimed to be the owner, when a greater portion thereof belonged to her insane husband, will not defeat a recovery.

To the point that the wife is entitled to make such claim out of her husband's property, see Noyes v. Belding, 5 S. D. 603, 59 N. W. 1069; Meyer v. Beaver, 9 S. D. 168, 68 N. W. 310. Where exempt property is involved, the controlling point in claim and delivery is the right of possession, rather than the right of property; and as against appellant, whose duty it was to have an appraisement made, respondent has shown by uncontroverted evidence a right of exclusive possession of all the property described, and she was entitled to maintain the action. Sprague v. Clark, 41 Vt. 6; Moorman v. Quick, 20 Ind. 67; Eldridge v. Sherman, 70 Mich. 266, 38 N. W. 255; Lazard v. Wheeler, 22 Cal. 139. Judge Cooley, in speaking for the court in Tandler v. Saunders, 56 Mich. 142, 22 N. W. 271, says: "One who has a right to use property at will can replevy it from any wrongdoer, as, for example, from a sheriff's officer who has taken it on an execution issued against another person." The constitutional declaration is that to all heads of families a reasonable amount of personal property, the kind and value of which is to be fixed by general law, shall be exempt; and the plain intent of the law is to preserve such property, to the value of $750, for the benefit of the family, to be selected by the head of the family, or by his agent or attorney, as additional exemptions. Chap. 86, Laws 1890. Where, therefore, by reason of the insanity or other infirmity of the husband, the wife becomes the head of the family, the interest of its members in personal property rightfully in her possession, to the value of that involved in this suit, is sufficient to authorize the wife to select the same under claim of ownership, although the greater portion thereof may really belong to her husband. Crane v. Waggoner, 33 Ind. 83; Linander v. Longstaff, 7 S. D. 157, 63 N. W. 775. To effectuate the purpose of statutes enacted for the protection of families against want occasioned by the forced sale of exempt property, a liberal rule of construction should be invoked, by which the wife and mother, when the head of the family, may claim exemptions, within the statutory limitation, out of her own and her husband's property, or the separate property of either, without specific allegation as to which the different articles belong. Braswell v. McDaniel, 74 Ga. 319. The value of the use of the property during its wrongful detention was in this case the truest measure of damages, and the amount awarded was fully justified by competent evidence. Allen v. Fox, 51 N. Y. 563, 10 Am. Rep. 641; Northrup v. Cross, 2 N. D. 433, 51 N. W. 718.

Under the view we have taken, the rulings of the court relating to evidence admitted and excluded become immaterial, as the result could not have been different.

There being no reversible error, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

JOSEPH SCHLITZ BREWING COMPANY,
Appt.

(.....S. D.....)

1. The owner of a building standing on a business street, who, knowing that it has been negligently constructed by the use of improper materials and liable to fall of its own weight, continues to use it or permit it to be used, is guilty of continuing a nuisance, and is liable for injuries caused by its collapse, to a person lawfully standing in front of it at the time, although it is then in the possession of a lessee.
2. The fact that a building has stood for ten years without falling is not sufficient to disprove that it was negligently constructed.
3. A complaint alleging the negligent maintenance of a building that was improperly constructed is not insufficient because it fails to state specifically in what respects it was negligently constructed, or in what respect the materials used were insufficient for such a structure.

overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the fall of a building owned by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George W. Case, for appellant:

Negligence is not actionable unless it is the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

Actionable negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury.

In determining the question of negligence the situation and knowledge of the parties, and the attendant circumstances, must be considered.

The charge of negligence in the construction of the building, being absolutely destroyed by the length of time which the complaint alleges the building stood, not showing any weakness or decay, is wholly insufficient upon which to predicate this action.

The fact that this particular building had through fortuitous circumstances stood for ten years, and then fell of its own weight at the end of that time, raises no presumption of law or fact that it was not negligently constructed; but, on the other hand, the fact that it did so fall without any extraneous cause, not only constitutes evidence of negligence per se, but it also raises a presumption of negligence in its construction.

Corson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the plaintiff to recover damages for injuries received by him, caused by the falling of a building owned by the defendant. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint on the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant, and 48 L. R. A.

also that it appears on the face of the said complaint that there is a defect of parties defendant. The demurrer was overruled, and from the order overruling the demurrer defendant appeals.

The following are the material allegations in the complaint necessary to be considered in determining as to the correctness of the court's ruling in overruling the demurrer:

"(3) That on the 21st day of June, 1897, defendant owned, had control of, and had for more than ten years immediately prior thereto owned and had control of, a certain grout building, known as the 'Mulholland Building' which was then and there, and for some time prior to said date had been, occupied by a tenant of defendant, and situated on the following described premises in the city of Watertown, county of Codington;

. . . that said building was negligently constructed of improper materials, and in an improper and negligent manner (being what is known as a 'grout building,' consisting principally of mortar), and was old, and negligently used and permitted to be used by the defendant as a place where the public were permitted to resort, and was rented by the defendant at the time of its collapse, hereinafter mentioned, for saloon purposes, on a main business street in said city of Watertown; that said building was at all of said times, and particularly on the 21st day of June, 1897, in a dangerous and unsafe condition, by reason of its negligent construction and the negligent use of improper materials in its construction, and was liable at any time, of its own weight, to collapse and injure persons who might be lawfully in or near the same, as defendant well knew. (4) That on the 21st day of June, 1897, while the plaintiff was lawfully in front of said Mulholland Building, above described, the said building, by reason of its said defective and negligent construction, and the negligent and defective materials of which it was constructed, and by reason of the negligence of the defendant in permitting said building to remain and be used as aforesaid, did fall and collapse, and that said building, and a large and heavy mass of timbers and materials out of which it was constructed, did fall upon and greatly injure this plaintiff, without any fault on his part. . . ."

It is contended on the part of the appellant that the complaint is defective, in that it fails to charge that the appellant constructed the building, and hence it cannot be claimed that the appellant was guilty of negligence in the construction of the same, and it must be inferred that, if appellant was negligent in regard to the building, it was because of its knowledge of its faulty construction after it had been so constructed. The appellant further contends that the allegation that the appellant owned the said building, and had owned the same for more than ten years immediately prior thereto, contradicts and negatives the allegation that the building was negligently constructed of improper materials and in an improper manner; that the construction of the building was too remote to constitute the proximate cause of respondent's injury. The respondent contends in support of the court's ruling that the complaint is one for damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the falling of the defendant's building without extraneous cause, which building was negligently constructed of improper materials, and in an improper and negligent manner (being what is known as a "grout building," consisting principally of mortar), and was old, and negligently used and permitted to be used by the defendant, and rented by it, for saloon purposes. It is not claimed by respondent that the injuries were sustained by reason of a failure to repair the building, or that the purpose for which it was used caused the injury, but the gist of the action is the negligent construction and maintenance of the building by the defendant as owner. The defect claimed is one which repairs could not obviate. It is claimed by respondent that the fact that it was rented by the defendant for saloon purposes, and used as such, is set forth in the complaint for the purpose of showing that it was not the improper use of the building which caused it to fall, but that the fault was in the structure, inherently. The defendant by its demurrer admits, for the purposes of the demurrer, that the facts stated in the complaint are true. The defendant therefore admits that the said building was negligently constructed of improper materials, and in an improper and negligent manner; that the said building was what is known as a "grout building," consisting principally of mortar, and was old, and negligently used and permitted to be used by the defendant as a place where the public were permitted to resort; that said building was at all of said times, and particularly on the 21st day of June, 1897, in a dangerous and unsafe condition, by reason of its negligent construction and was liable at any time, of own weight, to fall and injure persons who might be lawfully in or near the same, as defendant well knew. It is true that it is not stated that the defendant constructed the said building, but it is stated that it has owned and used the building for ten years or more, well knowing that it was so negligently constructed by the use of improper materials, and was liable at any time to fall of its own weight. Assuming these facts to be true, it would seem to necessarily follow that the defendant would be liable for any injuries resulting to persons rightfully in or about said building, and the fact that the building was leased to, and in the possession of, a tenant at the time the accident occurred would not relieve the defendant from such liability. It seems to be the proper rule that the landlord is liable for the negligent construction, and the tenant for the negligent use, of the premises. If a dangerous or injurious structure is erected on the premises when he lets them to the tenant, the landlord is, of course, liable, but he cannot be made answerable for such a structure erected by the tenant unless he renews the lease for the premises after knowledge of such dangerous or injurious structure; and if the injury occurs after the original owner has alienated the property, from a dangerous structure erected by him before alienation, he is not liable, the new owner alone being responsible. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 473, 474; Congreve v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 79; Clifford v. Dam, 81 N. Y. 52; Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295; Davenport v. Ruckman, 37 N. Y. 568; Anderson v. Dickie, 26 How. Pr. 105; Knausa v. Brua, 107 Pa. 85; Khron v. Brook, 144 Mass. 516, 11 N. E. 748. The owner of a building adjoining a street or highway is under a legal obligation to take reasonable care that it is kept in proper condition, so that it shall not fall into the street or highway and injure persons lawfully there. Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530. The general rule is that every person must so use his own property as not to injure others. Anything wrongfully done or committed which injures or annoys another in the enjoyment of his legal rights is an actionable nuisance. Cooley, Torts, § 565. A nuisance may result from the negligent acts of commission or omission of another. The owner is liable if the nuisance was erected on the land by the prior owner or by a stranger, and he knowingly maintains or continues it. Metzger v. Schultz, 16 Ind. App. 454, 43 N. E. 880, 45 N. E. 619. If, therefore, the building in controversy was originally negligently constructed of unsafe and unsuitable material, so that it was liable to fall of its own weight, it constituted a nuisance; and if the defendant, with knowledge of its negligent construction and the use of unsuitable material therein, continued to use said building, or permitted it to be used, it was guilty of continuing the nuisance, and would be liable to the party injured by reason of the negligent construction of the building, and the use in the construction of such building of improper and unsuitable materials. Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295; House v. Metcalf, 27 Conn. 631.

The contention of appellant that the statement in the complaint that the building had been owned and used by the defendant for more than ten years tends to contradict the statement that the building was negligently and improperly constructed, is not tenable. From the fact that the building fell of its own weight, without any external violence, a fair presumption would be that the fall occurred through adequate causes, one of the most natural of which would be the negligent and faulty construction of the building itself. The fact, therefore, that it had stood for a number of years without falling would afford very slight evidence that it had been properly constructed, and of suitable material. In the case of Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530, the building which fell, as reported in that case, was constructed in 1854, and remained standing until 1870, when a part of its walls fell outward into the street, causing the injury to the plaintiff in that action; but it does not appear to have been there claimed that the fact that the building had been in use 16 years or more constituted any objection to the recovery by the plaintiff.

It is further contended by the appellant that it does not appear from the complaint, specifically, in what respects the building was negligently constructed, nor in what respect the materials used were insufficient for such a structure; but it seems, in general, that a complaint specifying the act, the commission or omission of which caused the injury, and averring generally that it was negligently and carelessly done or omitted, will suffice. 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 334, and cases cited. See also Rogers v. Truesdale, 57 Minn. 126, 58 N. W. 688.

It will be observed that in the case at bar no negligence of the tenant is alleged, nor is it alleged that the building fell by reason of any decay, or by reason of its being out of repair. Hence there seems to be no cause of action for which the tenant would be liable, and hence there is no misjoinder of parties.

Our conclusion is that the overruling of the demurrer by the court was correct.

The order overruling the demurrer is affirmed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

D. M. DOTY, Appt.,

v.

CHATTANOOGA UNION RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(.....Tenn.....)

A covenant in a deed of land for a railroad right of way, that certain trains shall be run on the road to be built thereon, which is the chief consideration of the conveyance, is a covenant running with the land, on which an action may be maintained against a subsequent purchaser of the railroad who fails to run such trains, notwithstanding the fact that the covenant had been broken by the original grantee before such transfer, and although the covenant does not expressly refer to assigns.

(November 18, 1899.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County in favor of defendants in a proceeding to enforce a covenant requiring the running of trains over a right of way granted by plaintiff to defendants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pritchard & Sizor, for appellant:

The artificial rule in Spencer's Case, 5 Coke, 16a, made a distinction between covenants which related to things in esse and those which related to things not in esse, holding that the former bound the assignee although not named, but that the latter did not bind the assignee.

In the English note to Spencer's Case, in 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. pp. 186-188, it is pointed out that in the English case of Minshull v. Oakes, 2 Hurlst. & N. 793, the court of exchequer has not only expressed an opinion that the rule announced by Coke as having been decided in Spencer's Case is unreasonable, but has also suggested that the case decided the contrary.

And at page 208, in the American note, it is said: "It may be absurd that the question whether it is necessary to covenant for 'assigns' as to anything not in esse at the time of the covenant, discussed in the first and second resolutions of the leading case, has generally been passed over lightly in this country, and the use of the word 'assigns' considered of little importance if an intention that the covenant shall run be gathered from the whole instrument."

Masury v. Southworth, 9 Ohio St. 340; Bradford Oil Co. v. Blair, 113 Pa. 83, 57 Am. Rep. 442, 4 Atl. 218.

The intention of the parties to a covenant respecting real property is the controlling element in determining whether or not a covenant runs with the land.

The covenant sued on does clearly touch and concern the estate.

Horn v. Miller, 136 Pa. 640, 9 L. R. A. 810, 20 Atl. 706.

The deed in this case is (1) a conveyance of a railroad right of way.

2. The deed is made and expressed to be made "in consideration of an agreement by the grantee to run daily passenger trains over and along the right of way granted.

3. The habendum of the deed is to "the Chattanooga Union Railway Co., its successors and assigns," and the warranty uses the same words.

4. The deed contains no reference to the building of the railroad.

5. The deed contains no provision that improvements placed upon the land shall pass to grantor, and no words that by any stretch of the imagination can be applicable to "things not in esse" within the rule in Spencer's Case.

The effect of this deed is to convey an easement only.

Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Geisel, 119 Ind. 77, 21 N. E. 470; Blakely v. Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. 46 Neb. 272, 64 N. W. 972; State, Morris Canal & Bkg. Co., Prosecutors v. Brown, 27 N. If the expression in the grant, "in consideration of an agreement to run daily passenger trains over and along the right of way granted," is a condition, it is necessarily attached to the grant; it necessarily "runs with the land," and savors of the thing granted.

Provisos, recitals, or other words of a deed which indicate the purpose of a grant are sufficient of themselves to create a condition.

The remedy of the grantor for failure to perform a condition is not limited to the assertion of the forfeiture and re-entry. He may waive the forfeiture and sue for damages.

If the covenant relates to the interest or estate granted, so that its performance or nonperformance will affect the quality, value, or mode of enjoyment of the estate, it will run with the land, and bind anyone taking the estate with notice.

8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 138, 139 et seq.

The grant of the property for a right of way was a grant of an easement only, and the declaration of the purpose of the grant imposed a restriction upon the use of the property.

Any person holding the property, with notice, would be liable to the plaintiff for damages for condition or covenant broken.

The doctrine of Spencer's Case has no application.

Dorsey v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 58 Ill. 65; Norfleet v. Cromwell, 64 N. C. 1; Georgia Southern R. Co. v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 263, 284; Countryman v. Deck, 13 Abb. N. C. 110; Hickey v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 51 Ohio St. 40, 23 L. R. A. 396, 36 N. E. 672.

There is nothing in the rule in Spencer's Case to prevent a covenant like the one in Doty's deed running with the land.

Messrs. Shepherd & Frierson, for appellees:

The benefit of a covenant relating to land will run with the land, but the burden of such a covenant will not, except in cases growing out of leases, as to which the rule was changed by 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34.

First Nat. Bank v. Security Bank, 61 Minn. 31, 63 N. W. 264; Spencer's Case, 1 Smith, Lead Cas. pp. 172 et seq.

A covenant real is that whereby an obligation to pass something real is created, as lands or tenements, or the obligation of which is so connected with the realty that he who has the latter is entitled to the benefit or liable to perform the other.

Sharswood's Bl. Com. 304, note 10; Brew v. Van Deman, 6 Heisk. 439.

Such a covenant is not a lien on the land, but merely imposes a personal obligation on whoever becomes the owner or enjoys the possession of the land, and this, ordinarily, whether the covenant in terms names the covenantor and "assigns," or only the covenantor.

But to the latter part of this rule Spencer's Case made an exception.

A covenant cannot be said to attach itself to, and become a part of, something which does not exist.

Kerr, Real Prop. § 1218; Bream v. Dickerson, 2 Humph. 128; Cronin v. Watkins, 1

Tenn. Ch. 125; Brooks v. Smith, Thompson's Tenn. Cas. 226, Shannon's Cases, 158.

The covenant in this suit extended to the manner of operating a railroad, a thing not then in esse, and could not bind an assignee or vendee of the covenantor unless "assigns" were expressly mentioned in the covenant.

The omission of the word "assigns" in one covenant shows that the parties considered it, or intended it, to be of a different nature from the covenants in which it is used.

All covenants relating to a subject-matter not in esse, such as for the erection of buildings upon the premises demised, are personal covenants, and do not run with the land so as to bind the assignees, unless they are expressly named therein.

If the covenant be annexed to a thing not in esse before, but de novo to be erected on the thing,—as, to set up a new house, and the like,—in this case it will not bind the assignees unless they be named in the covenant.

A covenant to build and maintain a partition fence or party wall does not run with the land, and is only personal.

A purchaser of land acquires all the benefits or burdens incident to a covenant running with the lands when he purchases.

Whenever a breach occurred, a right of action accrued at once. Doty could have brought the same suit six months after the breach that he brought five years after.

If the covenant did not cease to run after its breach, there would be continuing and recurring breaches of it, and Doty might maintain action after action, and recover in each his full damages.

If a breach of the covenants in the lease occurs after the conveyance to the purchaser, it is his prejudice, and he may recover therefor the damages sustained.

3 Comyns, Dig. 256, 257.

If before, the covenant is a mere chose in action, and does not pass as an incident to the land.

A nominal breach is sufficient to arrest the covenant in the hands of the covenantee, and prevent it from passing with a subsequent descent or transfer.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for breach of covenant contained in a deed made by plaintiff, Doty, to the Chattanooga Union Railway Company. The effort is to hold the assignee of that company upon the covenant, as one running with land. Under the charge of the trial judge, the jury found for the defendant assignee, and plaintiff has appealed and assigned errors.

The question, as submitted to this court, is whether the covenant sued on is one which runs with the land, and affects the transferee, or is merely the personal covenant of the Chattanooga Union Railway Company, the original grantee. In 1889 this railway company desired to extend its lines, already partially constructed, through the lands of the plaintiff. An agreement was made between the railroad company and plaintiff, which, for the purposes of this suit, sufficiently appears from the recitals and covenants in the deed by plaintiff to the railroad company. These recitals are as follows: "For and in consideration of $5 in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and an agreement by the grantee to run daily passenger trains on and along the right of way granted, I, D. M. Doty, have bargained and sold unto the Chattanooga Union Railway Co., for right of way for the road of said company, the following described pieces and parcels of land, . . . to have and to hold the same, together with all the rights, privileges, erections, and appurtenances thereon or thereunto belonging, to the said Chattanooga Union Railway Company, its successors and assigns, forever, with the promise that no other railway company shall be allowed to put its tracks on the right of way aforesaid; and, if the same is abandoned by nonuse for six months, the title will revert to me. . . . I warrant the title thereunto, and hereby bind myself, my heirs and representatives, to defend the same to the said Chattanooga Union Railway Company, its successors and assigns, against the lawful claims of all persons." The deed is dated July 19, 1889. About three months thereafter the road was constructed and completed over the land, trains were put in operation, and a passenger service inaugurated. A station house was built on the land, passenger trains were run once every hour each way, and passengers were received and discharged at Doty's, the station on the land; all trains stopping there. After some time the trains were decreased to three a day. After September, 1892, only mixed trains were operated and only one per day; and in November, 1896, they ceased altogether to stop at this station, and ceased altogether to run passenger trains. In 1895, the railway company having become insolvent, all its property was sold to one Merrill, and he afterwards conveyed to the Belt Railway Company; and this company leased to the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, which undertook to operate the line, pay all expenses, and defend all suits arising out of the operation of the road, to pay all judgments recovered against it, keep the premises in repair, and return same when the lease expired. The circuit judge, in substance, told the jury that, inasmuch as the railroad had not been built when Doty made the deed, the contract was personal and binding on the Chattanooga Union Railway Company only, and had no binding force upon its successors or assigns, and that, as the covenant had been breached before the road was transferred to the parties against whom relief is sought as transferees, no recovery could be had against them. The plaintiff asks no judgment against the Chattanooga Union Railway Company, as it is insolvent, and the contest is with the transferees, upon the idea that the terms of the deed make a covenant upon the part of such transferees; and, as before stated, this is the only question. This court is requested to determine. Very exhaustive and able briefs have been filed by counsel, and we are cited to a large number of cases, many of which we do not think apply to the real case under consideration.

We think, if we look at the situation of the parties, and what was intended by the provisions in question, it will aid us in reaching the rights of the parties. The Chattanooga Union Railway Company desired to obtain a right of way over the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff was willing to grant it, provided passenger service was furnished over the road. It appears that plaintiff also expected a station to be maintained upon the land, or so near to it as to make the passenger service a convenience and benefit, but for some reason he seems to have omitted this feature from his written contract. It is manifest he cannot demand of any of the defendants anything more than that they shall run daily passenger trains over that right of way as provided in the deed. Whatever benefit would accrue to plaintiff from this, he is entitled to from his grantee, and more than this he cannot claim from anyone. Now, as to the original grantee: It acquired under this agreement, and the conveyance in which it is embodied, a right of way for railroad purposes, and for these purposes alone. This right granted to the railroad conferred upon it an easement over and upon the land; that is, a right to construct and lay its track over and upon the land, and to operate it. Jones, Easem. § 212. It is not provided how long this easement shall continue, except that, if it is abandoned for six months, it shall be extinguished, and the full title shall revert in or revert to the plaintiff, as owner of the fee or reversion. Nor is it provided how long the plaintiff shall be entitled to have the daily passenger trains operated. It is plain that the running of the train was to be, and was, the consideration for the right of user of the easement. Both were continuing rights, and they were mutually dependent upon each other. So long as the consideration was paid (that is, the trains were run), just so long was the road entitled to operate and enjoy its easement. It seems plain that if the consideration should fail, by trains being discontinued, then the privilege purchased for this consideration of using the right of way should also fail. If the landowner had sold his land, he could not have conveyed it clear of this servitude, so long as the railroad company kept up its part of the contract by furnishing the service. If the railroad company had sold its property, its assignee could only continue to operate the road by paying the consideration therefor, to wit, operating the train. A sale in invitum would carry with it the same results, as to either the landowner or the easement owner. The obligations are continuing and mutual. Each is based upon the other, and incurred in view of the other. It might not have been a wise contract to make, but there is no law prohibiting unwise contracts. It may turn out that the duty of running a passenger train will be a burden upon the road. It may be it will be but a barren benefit to the landowner, as he can only require it to run, and not to stop.

We have examined the numerous cases cited by defendant's counsel. We do not think they are applicable, and many cited by the plaintiff's counsel are also inapplicable, as we view the case. We are of opinion the principle involved is that passed upon by the supreme court of Alabama in Gilmer v. Mobile & M. R. Co. 79 Ala. 569. In that case the plaintiff had conveyed to Alabama & Florida Railroad Company a right of way through his land, in consideration that the railroad would stop its passenger and freight trains opposite his house, and receive and discharge passengers and freight, upon proper signal. The deed contained no language binding the assigns of the railroad company. The Mobile & Montgomery Railroad Company was the successor and assign of the grantee. The plaintiff contended that the covenant ran with the land and bound the assignee. This was demurred to. The circuit judge sustained the demurrer, and the supreme court reversed this ruling, and held that the assignee was bound, though not named in the deed or covenant, and that the obligation to maintain a flag station was a continuing one, for any breach of which any owner of the right of way would be liable. The obligation to receive and discharge passengers was a burden upon the easement, which was in turn a burden upon the land. In the case at bar the obligation to run a daily passenger train over this particular piece of road was a burden upon the easement or privilege of owning and operating the right of way. In both cases the service to be rendered by the railroad was in the nature of rent for the use of the right of way, no other consideration being paid therefor. The road might have paid in solido, in money or otherwise, for this right of way, once for all; but it stipulated to render certain service, that service to be continuous, and it is bound by its agreement. And so is any assignee or transferee bound to render the same service, so long as it claims and enjoys the privilege, even though the word "assigns" is not used. The personal obligation of the original grantee could not extend beyond the time when his ownership ceased, as he would no longer be able to render the service without the road to render it upon, nor could the owner be required to look to such original grantee for any damages, except such as accrued up to that time; and yet the obligation to render the service must still continue, as a burden upon the easement or privilege of operating the road. So, if the contract was breached by the original grantee, the owner would have had his right of action at once. But this would not have exhausted his rights or remedies, for the obligations on each side are continuing; and a suit for breach at any time would, in a case like this, only cover the damages to that time, and as to the time subsequent to the breach the obligation continues, with successive rights of action for successive breaches. Even if we were mistaken in this view, still the breach by the original grantee of the obligation to render the service did not put an end to that obligation, and convert the landowner's right to merely a chose in action for the breach already committed; and, even if it did, he might waive such right, or delay it, and bring the action at such time as he chose, and against such parties as at the time being might be liable for such breach. The consideration for this conveyance was not the building of the railroad, but it was 48 L. R. A.

the daily running of the trains. We might suppose the right of way occupied, and the road in operation. The landowner applies for damages under the statute, and the road meets him with the proposition, "If you will forego your damages, we will stipulate to render certain continuous service." Would this not be a continuing obligation that would attach to the use of the easement? But the present case is stronger, for the railroad obtains the privilege of occupancy and operation before there is any actual occupancy, upon the consideration that for such occupancy and privilege of operation the road will render a continuing service. The case of Midland R. Co. v. Fisher, 125 Ind. 19, 8 L. R. A. 604, 24 N. E. 756, is also in point. In that case a right of way was granted to a railroad company in consideration of its agreement to construct a fence on each side of the railroad when completed. The railroad was not built until three years after the deed was made. The grantee road mortgaged all its property, including the right of way, and the mortgage was foreclosed, and the defendant purchased and entered into possession. The land also passed to another owner. No fence was built. In an action for damages against the purchaser of the road at foreclosure sale, upon the agreement to build, the court held it liable, not because it was bound for the debts of the old company, but because, by accepting and taking charge of the right of way, it became obligated to build the fence; and the court said the purchaser could not be permitted to enjoy the easement, and refuse to perform the agreement which created and conferred it. It said further that one who takes a privilege in land, to which a burden is annexed, has no right to assert a claim to the privilege and deny responsibility for the burden; a party who acquires such a privilege acquires it subject to the conditions and burdens bound up with it, and must, if he asserts a right to the privilege, bear the burdens which the contract creating the privilege brought into existence. The covenant is an integral part of the deed upon which rests the right of the appellant. The deed which creates the asserted right discloses the covenant which burdens the right. In accepting the right under such a deed, and asserting a claim to the privilege conferred by it, subsequent grantees of the original covenantee become bound to perform the agreement. The covenant passed with the land. The easement which burdened the fee was an encumbrance, and the party that took the land took it subject to the encumbrance; but, in taking subject to the encumbrance of the easement, that party acquired the benefit interwoven with the encumbrance. Both the burden and the benefit, the easement and the covenant, essentially inhere in the land. One benefits the estate, the other burdens it. The party who acquires the estate necessarily acquires it with both the burden and the benefits. He must submit to the one, but he has a right to the other. In accord with this holding are cited Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Priest, 131 Ind. 413, 31 N. E. 77; Hazlett v. Sinclair, 76 Ind. 488, 40 Am. Rep. 254; Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 335; Huston v. Cincinnati & Z. R. Co. 21 Ohio St. 235; Carr v. Lowry, 27 Pa. 257; Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550; and, while there are distinguishing features in each case, the general principle involved is the same in each.

The case of Georgia Southern R. Co. v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492, was one where the grantor, in consideration of $25 and of the building of the railroad, conveyed to a company, its successors and assigns, forever, in fee simple, the right of way through his land, and added in the deed the following words: "It is hereby agreed and understood a depot and station is to be located and given to said Osborn Reeves on the land, or strip above conveyed, to be permanently located for the benefit of said Osborn Reeves and his assigns and to be used for the general purposes of the railroad company." And it was held that the railroad, by accepting such deed, entered into a covenant to comply with its terms, and this covenant ran with the land, and became obligatory upon any second company which became the purchaser, under proper legal direction, of all the rights, privileges, franchises, and property of the former. It has been held in a number of cases, and is not questioned, that the acceptance of such a deed, though not signed by the grantee, binds such grantee to the stipulations and covenants in it. Midland R. Co. v. Fisher, 125 Ind. 19, 8 L. R. A. 604, 24 N. E. 756, and authorities there collated. In Dorsey v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 58 Ill. 65, it appears that a railroad entered into an agreement with Dorsey, in consideration of his conveyance of certain premises, that it would make and maintain certain fences and cattle guards at such places as Dorsey might designate, and soon thereafter it conveyed its franchises to another road. Dorsey brought an action on the covenant against the assignee, averring that it had notice of the agreement. A general demurrer was interposed and sustained upon the ground that the covenant was merely personal, and did not bind the assignee; and it was held that this was error; that the covenant related to the land, and was, from the relations of the parties, perpetual in its nature, and bound the assignee when the legislature conferred upon it power to purchase the land. Where an estate is conveyed for a specified purpose, the purpose marks the limit or boundary beyond which the estate conveyed cannot exist. Macon v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 82 Ga. 501, 9 S. E. 1127; 3 Elliott, Railroads, §§ 939-941. The courts incline, when the words may be construed as a condition or covenant, to hold that they create a covenant, and not a forfeiture. 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 945, and cases cited. But, if the words were construed to be a forfeiture, that might be waived, and the party aggrieved may have his damages. 3 Elliott, Railroads, §§ 942 et seq. It is said in 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 138, 139, that if a covenant relates to the interest or estate granted, so that its performance or nonperformance will affect the quality, value, or mode of enjoyment of the estate, it will run with the land, and bind anyone taking the estate with notice. See the cases there cited. The supreme court of North Carolina held in Norfleet v. Cromwell, 61 N. C. 1, in substance, that the rule in Spencer's Case, 5 Coke, 16a, had no application to grants and covenants concerning easements, and said, in effect, that covenants creating easements run with the land, as against assignees in fee, when the intent to create them is clear, the easement apparent, and the covenant consistent with public policy; and added that covenants are the proper mode of creating such servitudes as consist in acts to be done by the owner of the servient estate. The court said: "The canal has been cut. The defendant cannot, in the nature of things, release the benefits which he acquired. The land cannot be returned to its former condition." And so the court held the party in possession upon his covenant to repair. See, to same effect, Crawford v. Witherbee, 77 Wis. 419, 9 L. R. A. 561, 46 N. W. 545. It is true, in the North Carolina case the words "heirs and assigns" were used with regard to both parties, and the canal was already in existence; and the case is cited only as to the question of the applicability of the rule in Spencer's Case to easements. In Masury v. Southworth, 9 Ohio St. 351, this principle is announced: "That if the thing to be done upon the land, though not existing at the time of the demise, would be of a permanent nature, connected with the use and enjoyment of the land, and beneficial to the assignee, an intent that it should run with the land and bind the assignee, shown by naming him in the deed, would be effectual." It was then held that the word "assigns" is not used in a technical sense, and as the only word appropriate for the purpose, but that any equivalent words manifesting an intent to bind an assignee will suffice.

While we think this is the proper view to take of the case, and these are the rules and principles to be applied, we are not unmindful of the authorities cited for the defendant, and which, it appears, were persuasive, if not controlling, in the court below; and the very able presentation of them in this court calls for a notice of them. We think they are clearly distinguishable from the cases we have cited and from the one at bar. The contention of the defendant may well be formulated in the following words from Tiedeman. Real Prop. § 190: "Covenants which relate to a subject-matter not in esse, as for the erection of a new building upon the premises, do not run with the land, so as to bind assignees, unless they are expressly named therein." See, to same effect, Kerr, Real Prop. § 1218; Washb. Real Prop. p. 532; Taylor, Land. & T. § 260; Spencer's Case, 5 Coke, 16a, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 138; Newburg Petroleum Co. v. Weare, 44 Ohio St. 604, 9 N. E. 845; Tallman v. Coffin, 4 N. Y. 136; Lyford v. North Pacific O. R. Co. 92 Cal. 95, 28 Pac. 103. The last-named case was decided under a Code limiting covenants running with the land to those conferring benefits on the land, and is not applicable in this state. We are referred to the cases of Bream v. Dickerson, 2 Humph. 126; Brooks v. Smith, Thompson's Tenn. Cas. 158; Cronin v. Watkins, 1 Tenn. Ch. 125; Hite v. Parks, 2 Tenn. Ch. 373,—as holding with defendant's contention. In the first-named case there was an agreement on part of the lessor to pay the lessee for improvements made during the lease, or that the lessee might take pay out of the rents. There was an assignment of the lease, on the one hand, and of the reversion, on the other; and the court treated the question as to whether the agreement or covenant to pay for improvements passed to the assignee of the lease as against the assignee of the reversion. The court said that there was no covenant on the part of the lessees to improve, except at their option, and the covenant of the lessor was to pay if they were made and left standing at the expiration of the lease. It was added that it was difficult to conceive how a covenant to pay a pecuniary consideration for a house, if the tenant should see proper to erect it, could be said to touch and concern the land, so as to run with it. But the court also held that the agreement was a personal covenant, upon the theory of Spencer's Case, 5 Coke, 16a, where it was sought to charge the defendant, as assignee of the lessee, for failure to construct a brick wall upon the demised premises. The court said, among other things: "When the covenant extends to a thing in esse, parcel of the demise, the thing to be done by force of the covenant is, quodam modo annexed and appurtenant to the thing demised, and shall go with the land, and shall bind the assignee, although he be not bound by express words; but, when the covenant extends to a thing which is not in being at the time of the demise made it cannot be appurtenant or annexed to the thing which hath no being: as, if the lessee covenants to repair the houses demised to him during the term, that is parcel of the contract, and extends to the support of the thing demised, and therefore is, quodam modo, annexed appurtenant to houses, and shall bind the assignee, although he be not bound expressly by the covenant. But in the case at bar, the covenant concerns a thing which was not in esse at the time of the demise made, but to be newly built after, and therefore shall bind the covenantor, his executors or administrators, and not the assignee, for the law will not annex the covenant to a thing which hath no being." Bream v. Dickerson, 2 Humph. 128. The case of Brooks v. Smith, Thompson's Tenn. Cas. 226, approves this doctrine, stating it in these words: "A covenant to do something to a thing in existence at the time, as to repair the houses, cultivate the land in a particular manner, to reside on the premises, to let the lessee have free access to certain rooms in the house, etc., runs with the land, and binds the assignee, even without the word 'assigns'; . . . but if it be to erect something upon the 48 L. R. A.

premises, such as a house, shop, machinery, or wall, that does not bind the assignees, unless they are expressly named." Citing Addison, Contr. 979. The two cases cited from 1 and 2 Tenn. Ch., above, are in accord with this holding, and all recognize the Spencer Case. In other jurisdictions the Spencer Case has been criticised, if not denied. Without questioning the correctness of this holding upon the reason given, and confined strictly to the facts of the case, we think there is a difference in the cases, in this: In these cases there was a covenant or agreement (so far as it was absolute and not optional) to do a certain specified thing, as to build a house or wall, or pay for improvements. There was no continuing and daily accruing consideration or agreement on either side, there was no continuing obligation on either, as in this case. Here, from the very nature of the agreement, the burden must be borne by the party in possession for the time being, and operating the road. The benefit must accrue to the party in possession of the premises over which the easement is granted. The service can be rendered by no other, the benefit can be reaped by no other, except the parties in possession. It is not a consideration capable of being reduced to an absolute money value. The land is burdened by the easement. This can only be offset by the benefit to the servient estate, and this is a continuing burden and benefit.

But there is another view to take of the matter. The contract in this case on the part of the railroad is, not to build the road, but to render the passenger service after it is built. The contract upon the part of the landowner is to grant an easement. So far as this agreement goes, there is no stipulation to build or put something new on the land,—neither upon the servient estate nor upon the dominant estate. While, of course, the trains cannot operate unless the road is first built, there is no stipulation for the latter, but only for the former; treating the road as already constructively built. But, as to the landowner, his contract is to give an easement over his land. He does this by the very instrument which stipulates for the service. Upon the execution of this agreement the road has an easement before it does a lick of work on the land, or even enters upon it. There is no contract, therefore, to put anything new upon the land, but, rather, to use it in a certain manner; both parties acting upon the assumption that the road is already built. This makes a case analogous to the provisions already referred to, of cultivating or using the land in a certain manner, or residing on the premises, or allowing access to certain rooms in the house, in all of which cases the covenant runs with the land. We think, upon these grounds, and perhaps others that might be more satisfactorily stated, there is a well-marked distinction between the cases, and that this case does not fall within the reason or letter of the cases cited by defendant, but under those relied on by plaintiff, and others herein cited and commented upon.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the learned trial judge was in error, and the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

The appellee will pay costs of appeal.

Edward LEEPER, Appt.,
v.

STATE of Tennessee.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A statute prescribing uniform text-books for schools throughout the state, with provisions for their selection by a commission and the letting of a contract thereafter to the lowest bidder for supplying any books that have been approved by the commission, is not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 22, against monopolies, since the purpose of the statute is, not to confer any pecuniary benefit upon the state or school officials or publishers, but to confer a benefit upon the public.
2. The fact that the state is not bound by an agreement authorized by statute, giving a publisher the right to furnish all the text-books used in the public schools of the state, does not make the privilege invalid, so as to relieve a school teacher from liability for violating the provisions of the statute by using unauthorized text-books.
3. The authority of the state to regulate and control public schools includes the power to provide for the selection of uniform text-books for all the schools of the state, and to provide for the purchase thereof under a contract with the lowest bidder.
4. There is not such lack of safeguards against extortion and oppression as to render invalid a statute providing for the purchase of all the text-books used in the public schools of the state from the same publisher, where the statute provides for a letting at the lowest rates, in free competition, after public advertisement, and that the prices shall always be as low as the books have ever been, or are now being, published under contract in any state, county, or district of the United States, when like conditions prevail, while power is conferred upon a commission to judge of these conditions and enforce them.
5. Requiring payment in advance in order to obtain school books which have to be delivered out of the county is not an arbitrary provision of a statute providing for the purchase of all the text-books used in the public schools of the state from one publisher on a contract let to the lowest bidder, and does not infringe the right of the citizen to make purchases on credit.
6. Legislative power is not conferred upon a commission and the executive by a statute which authorizes the commission to select school books, make contracts with the lowest bidder for obtaining them for all the schools of the state from one publisher, and perfect the details of the general plan of providing all schools with such books, and gives to the commission and the governor, as an incident to this, the authority to announce when the details have been arranged so that the law may be put into operation.
7. No right of local self-government is infringed by a statute which provides for the selection of uniform text-books for all the schools in the state by a commission, and for letting a contract therefor to the lowest bidder.

(November 15, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Blount County convicting him of violating the statute requiring the use of uniform text-books in the schools. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Turley & Turley, for appellant:

The contract or arrangement contemplated by this act disseises the citizens of Tennessee of the common privilege of buying in the open market at the best price. It creates a monopoly.

Proprietors of Charles River Bridge v. Proprietors of Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 607, 9 L. ed. 847; Memphis v. Memphis Water Co. 5 Heisk. 529; Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 102, 21 L. ed. 417; Norwich Gaslight Co. v. Norwich City Gas Co. 25 Conn. 38; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. pp. 344, 345.

The clause of the Constitution prohibiting the creation of monopolies is of equal force and dignity with the clause giving the legislature power to control the public schools.

The purchase and sale of school books, as well as of all other books, is a matter of common right.

Any law which limits the common right of the citizens to buy the commodity of school books in the open market is a law which affects every citizen of the state.

If the contract or special-privilege feature of the act is unconstitutional, then the whole act must fall. The two features of the act—the one the selection of the books, and the other the creation of a special privilege or monopoly—are inextricably commingled.

Mr. G. W. Pickle for appellee.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant is convicted of violating the provisions of act 1899, chap. 205, commonly known as the "Uniform Text-Book Act," and sentenced to pay a fine of $10 and costs, and has appealed.

The indictment in the case is in the following words:

State of Tennessee, Blount County Circuit Court, Oct. Term, 1899. The grand jurors for the state of Tennessee, upon their oaths, present that Edward Leeper heretofore, to wit, on the 5th day of October, 1899, in the state and county aforesaid, being then and there a public school teacher, and teaching the public school known as "School No.

5," sixth district of Blount county, did unlawfully use and permit to be used in said public school, after the state text-book commission had adopted and prescribed for use in the public schools of the state Frye's Introductory Geography as a uniform text-book, another and different text-book on that branch than the one so adopted as aforesaid, to wit, Butler's Geography, and the New Eclectic Elementary Geography, against the peace and dignity of the state.

A. J. Fletcher,
Attorney General.

From the bill of exceptions, it appears that the defendant is a teacher of the public school known as "School No. 5," in the sixth district of Blount county, and that he failed and refused to teach the geography adopted by the state text-book commission, namely Frye's Introductory Geography, and that instead he wilfully and unlawfully taught Butler's and the New Eclectic Elementary Geography in said school. It is not insisted that there is any defect in, or objection to, the book prescribed by the state text-book commission to be used, and which he refused to teach.

The caption to the act under which the conviction is had thus expresses the object and subject-matter of the law, to wit: "An Act to Create a State Text-book Commission, and to Procure for Use in the Public Free Schools in This State a Uniform Series of Text-books; to Define the Duties and Powers of Said Commission, and Other Officers; to Make an Appropriation for the Carrying into Effect This Act, and to Provide Punishment and Penalties for the Violation of the Same." The substance of the act, so far as now necessary to be set out, is as follows:

Section 1 creates a state text-book commission, and empowers and directs it to select and adopt a uniform system or series of text-books for use in the public schools of the state. The commission is to consist of the governor, state superintendent of public instruction, and three members of the state board of education, to be selected by the governor. The text-books selected by the commission are to be used for five years in all the public schools of the state, and it is made unlawful for any school officer, director, or teacher to use any other text-books on the same branches. The series of books to be selected cover all the branches of study usually taught in the public schools. The commission is required to appoint a subcommission of five, to be selected from the teachers, and city and county superintendents, actually engaged in teaching in the state, to whom all books submitted to the commission shall be referred for report.

Section 2 makes the governor president of the commission; requires the commission to meet and organize immediately after the passage of the act; and directs it, as soon as practicable, and not later than thirty days after organization, to advertise in such manner, and for such length of time, and at such places, as may be deemed advisable, for sealed bids or proposals, from publishers of school text-books, for furnishing books to the public schools in the state, through agencies established by said publishers at places designated by the commission. Each bidder is required to deposit with the treasurer of the state a sum of money, such as the commission may require, not less than $500, nor more than $2,500, according to the number of books he may propose to supply. This deposit is to be forfeited if the bidder, in the event his bid is accepted, fails and refuses to make the contract and bond required by the act. Each bid is to be accompanied by one or more specimen copies of each book proposed to be furnished.

Section 3 requires all the specimen copies sent in with the bids to be referred to the subcommission for examination, with instructions to report back to the commission the books they recommend for adoption. When this report is submitted, the commission is to meet in executive session, open the bids, examine and consider the report of the subcommission, and determine the books to be selected for adoption. The successful bidder is then to be notified, and the contract executed. Each contractor is to give a bond, in the penalty of not less than $30,000, for the faithful performance of the contract.

Section 4 provides that the contractors shall print plainly on the back of each book the contract price, as well as the exchange price, at which it is to be furnished; and it then provides, among other things, as follows: "And the said text-book commission shall not, in any case, contract with any person, publisher or publishers, for the use of any book or books which are to be, or shall be sold to patrons for use in any public school in this state, at a price above or in excess of the price at which such book or books are furnished by said person, publisher, or publishers under contract to any state, county, or school district in the United States, under like conditions prevailing in this state, and under this act. And it shall be stipulated in each contract that the contractor has never furnished, and is not now furnishing under any contract, any state, county, or school district, in the United States, where like conditions prevail as are prevailing in this state, and under this act the same book or books as are embraced in said contract, at a price below or less than the price stipulated in said contract."

Section 5 provides that the state shall not be liable to any contractor, in any manner, for any sum whatever, but all such contractors shall receive their pay or consideration in compensation solely and exclusively derived from the proceeds of the sale of the book. It also provides that, in furnishing the new books, the contractor shall take up the old school books now in use, in exchange, at a price not less than 50 per cent of the contract price.

Section 6 provides for readvertising for other bids and proposals if the first are not satisfactory, and also for receiving proposals from authors who have manuscripts of books not yet published.

Section 7 requires the governor, as soon as the contracts have been entered into, to issue his proclamation announcing such fact to the people of the state.

Section 8 requires the contractors—First, to establish and maintain, in some one city in each grand division of the state, a depository to be designated by the commission, where a supply of the books, sufficient to meet the immediate demand, shall be kept; second, to maintain in each county of the state, if the commission so demands, not less than one, nor more than four agencies for the distribution of the books; and, third, to deliver to the person ordering all books ordered, provided the price is paid in advance, free of exchange or postage, if out of the county. It also provides that in each book sold there shall be printed the following: "The price fixed herein is fixed by state contract, and any deviation therefrom shall be reported to your county superintendent of public instruction, or the state superintendent at Nashville."

Section 9 allows the commission to renew the contracts, or, in its discretion, to re-advertise and make new contracts, for an additional five years.

Section 10 requires the state superintendent to issue a circular letter to each city and county superintendent, and to such others as he may desire, giving the list of books adopted, prices, location of agencies, etc.

Section 11 provides that the books adopted shall be introduced as text-books, and be used as such, to the exclusion of all others, in all the public free schools in the state.

Section 12 reserves to the citizens the right to buy books in the usual way, in the event that no contract is made, or if the contractor fails or refuses to furnish the books.

Sections 13 and 14 make it a misdemeanor for any person or teacher to violate the act, and for any teacher to use, or permit to be used, in his or her school, any text-book other than those adopted by the commission, and fix as the punishment for same a fine of not less than $10, nor more than $50.

Section 15 makes it a misdemeanor for any dealer, clerk, or agent to sell the book for more than the contract price.

Section 16 appropriates $1,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act.

Section 17 deals with the question of compensation for the commission and sub-commission.

And § 18 provides that the act shall take effect from its passage.

It is insisted that the act is unconstitutional, because (1) it allows a monopoly; (2) it delegates legislative power; (3) it denies local self-government.

These are quite general terms, and, if they stood alone would be insufficient to challenge the validity and constitutionality of the act; for it is well settled that he who insists upon the unconstitutionality of an act of the general assembly must point out the specific provision of the Constitution which, either expressly or by necessary implication, it violates. It has been said: It cannot be 48 L. R. A.

invalidated upon some supposed or assumed natural right or equity, upon the general statement that it is opposed to the inherent rights of freemen, nor upon any spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution not expressed in words, nor because it is opposed to the genius of a free people, nor upon any general or vague interpretation of a provision beyond its plain and obvious import. Bell v. Bank of Nashville, Peck (Tenn.) 269; Hope v. Deaderick, 8 Humph. 8, 47 Am. Dec. 507; Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 220, 10 S. W. 353; Davis v. State, 3 Lea, 377; Stratton Claimants v. Morris Claimants, 89 Tenn. 497, sub nom. Dibrell v. Lanier, 12 L. R. A. 70, 15 S. W. 87; Luehrman v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 2 Lea, 438; Reelfoot Lake Levee Dist. v. Dawson, 97 Tenn. 159, 34 L. R. A. 725, 36 S. W. 1041; Henley v. State, 98 Tenn. 683, 39 L. R. A. 126, 41 S. W. 352, 1104.

It is insisted that the following provisions of the Constitution are violated: Article 1, § 8, provides, among other things, that no man shall be dispossessed of his privileges but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. Art. 1, § 22, provides that perpetuities and monopolies are contrary to the genius of a free state, and shall not be allowed. Article 11, § 8, provides, among other things, that the legislature shall not have power to pass any law granting any individual rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions, other than such as may be by the same law extended to any member of the community who may be able to bring himself within the provisions of this law.

These may be considered together, as presenting the general question that the effect and operation of the act is to grant to the publisher who has been successful in obtaining the privilege of furnishing the books a monopoly, and has conferred on him special rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions, and thus a monopoly is allowed, and that the people generally of the state are deprived of the right and privilege of (1) selecting their own school books, (2) of buying them in the open market, and (3) other publishers are excluded from selling in competition with the successful party.

The interpretation given to this act by the state school authorities is clearly set out in an official letter from the state superintendent of public instruction as follows:.

State of Tennessee, Department of Public Instruction.

Morgan C. Fitzpatrick, Superintendent.

David L. Spence, Clerk.

Nashville, Tenn., Sept. 23, '99.

Mr. Wilford Caulkins, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Dear Sir:

The text-book law passed by the last legislature provides that the contract and exchange prices of all books shall be printed upon them; and the law provides, further: "All books shall be sold to the consumer at the retail contract price, and in each book shall be printed the following: The price fixed hereon is fixed by state contract, and any deviation therefrom shall be reported to your county superintendent, or the state superintendent at Nashville." From this it will be clearly seen that it was the intention of the legislature to adopt for use in the schools of this state a certain series of books, and that every book so adopted should have printed upon it the contract and exchange prices, and that no books should be used except those so marked. It was the intention of the commission, acting under the law, to provide an excellent series of books, and to protect the people against the importation and sale of second-hand books. The safe, correct, and legal rule to follow is: Purchase and use no books unless they have the contract and exchange prices printed upon them. Superintendents and teachers should accept and use the books adopted by the commission with prices according to law.

Yours, very truly,
Morgan C. Fitzpatrick.

Treating this, as well as the act, as an inhibition against the use of any books unless they have printed upon them the words specified in § 8, even though other books similarly bound, containing the same matter and by the same author, can be bought at less price in the open market, the question recurs, Is such legislation valid, or does it allow a monopoly, and confer special rights and privileges, or restrict the right to sell and buy which previously existed? It must be noted that the act only applies, and the inhibition only extends, to persons interested in public schools as officers, teachers, patrons, and pupils, and only to books that are used and to be used in the public schools. For any other purpose than use in the public schools, any book may be bought, and from any person, and by any person, and put to any use. This is the common right to buy and sell which existed before the act was passed, and which still continues unaffected. The books may now be bought as freely as before the act. It is the use in the public schools which the act regulates, and is intended to regulate. So that as to the buyer, no common right is taken away. As to the seller, he may also sell as before the act; and not only so, but, under the provisions of the act, the exclusive right to publish and sell for schools was left open to his competition in the first instance,—that is, all publishers were invited to freely compete for the contract or privilege of furnishing all the books, or any series of them, to be used in the schools.

A "monopoly" has been defined to be an exclusive right granted to a few of something which was before a common right. Memphis v. Memphis Water Co. 5 Heisk. 529; Proprietors of Charles River Bridge v. Proprietors of Warren River Bridge, 11 Pet. 607, 9 L. ed. 847. It is insisted that the right to sell and the right to buy in the open market are common rights, open to all, and without restriction upon any. But the right to sell and buy in the open market and the right to contract is not an unlimited one. The legislature has in a number of instances restricted such rights, and the limitations have been upheld by the courts. Thus, it 48 L. R. A.

is provided by statute that a person may not sell unwholesome fish or flesh, or bread or adulterated liquors, or poisonous drugs without a label (Shannon's Code, § 6743, and subsections); and it is held that transportation companies and telegraph companies cannot contract for exemption from liability from their own negligence (Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co. v. Bloch Bros. 86 Tenn. 392, 6 S. W. 881; Marr v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 85 Tenn. 529, 3 S. W. 496). It is true the first class of cases rests upon the exercise of the police power of the state, and the latter upon the public character of the railroad and telegraph company upon which a use is imposed which sanctions legislative interference. But it is not difficult to place the present legislation under either of these heads, since the kind and quality of instruction given the young is as important as the food furnished the people, and the public school is, in the highest sense, a public institution, whose operation involves a public use. But legislation has not been confined to such cases, in limiting the right to contract. It is provided by statute that a husband may not sell his wife's real estate during her life without her consent, and that he may not contract away the rents and profits without such consent. Shannon's Code, §§ 4234-4239. The constitutionality of such acts has been declared, though they abridge the right which the husband had at common law to contract. Coleman v. Satterfield, 2 Head, 264; Taylor v. Taylor, 12 Lea, 490. So it has been held that the legislature might prohibit the sale of loose cotton between sundown and sunrise. Truss v. State, 13 Lea, 311. Statutes of frauds, statutes against usury, statutes making contracts of married women unenforceable, and many others, are limitations upon the power of the citizen to contract. So with the statute making void stipulations in insurance policies which limit liability to less than full amount of the loss. This has been held valid. Dugger v. Mechanic's & T. Ins. Co. 95 Tenn. 245, 28 L. R. A. 796, 32 S. W. 5, and cases there cited.

It is immaterial whether we consider this act as deriving validity from the police power of the state or the public character of the schools. It is evident that the basic principle of it is the power of the legislature to subserve the general welfare by prohibiting certain contracts, and throwing around others restrictions tending to promote the general welfare, and protect the citizen from oppression, fraud, and wrong. That the state may establish a uniform series of books to be taught in the schools, which it provides and controls, seems to be a proposition as evident as that it may provide a uniform system of schools, which we take it is not now an open question; and while the selection of text-books may, in the earlier and cruder stages of the law, have been left to, and exercised by, local superintendents, directors, and teachers, it was not for want of authority in the state to prescribe a uniform system, but rather because the system had not reached that stage of development and progress that made it advisable, in the opinion of the legislature, to so provide. If we were allowed to look to the wisdom of such a provision, it would seem that a uniform series of school books, selected by men of large experience and extensive information, would be preferable to leaving such selection to superintendents, directors, and teachers, many without experience, some with limited education, and with limited opportunity of examining and comparing the different books.

But it is said that, if it be granted that a uniform series may be selected, still it is beyond the power of the legislature to confer upon one individual the right to publish and sell to the public school any particular book or books, and to prohibit teachers and patrons from using any other; thus forcing them to buy the books thus furnished or refusing them the benefits of the public school. We think it clear that the state itself might, if it saw proper, publish the books to be used in its public schools, and might sell them to the children of the state or patrons of the schools; and, if it can do this, why may it not authorize another to do so, and prescribe the terms upon which it shall be done, in the interest of its citizens? Memphis v. Memphis Water Co. 5 Heisk. 530. The authority of the state over schools is a legislative one, and it is difficult to see how a uniform system can be maintained which will confer equal benefits upon all sections of the state, unless it is done by legislative action. If the authority to regulate and control schools is legislative, then it must have an unrestricted right to prescribe methods, and the courts cannot interfere with it, unless some scheme is devised which is contrary to other provisions of the Constitution; so that the question recurs, Does the act create such a monopoly as the Constitution prohibits?

It is not insisted that the intention or operation of this act is to confer a pecuniary benefit on the state or school officials or publishers. On the contrary, its evident purpose is to confer a benefit upon the public, by providing ways and means by which books may not only be made uniform throughout the state, but also furnished to the public at as small cost as possible. If a privilege thus conferred upon an individual, the object of which is to benefit the state and its citizens, can be termed a "monopoly," it is certainly not of that class prohibited by the Constitution, which refers to privileges granted for a money consideration, or which are bestowed upon an individual for his benefit. The monopoly prohibited by the Constitution is a privilege farmed out to the highest bidder, or conferred because of favoritism to the donee, and not one awarded to the lowest bidder, and for the convenience and benefit of the public.

If this doctrine be not correct, then the state can make no contract for supplies for its penitentiary, for its charitable institutions, for its public printing, for building its state houses, or any other work of public utility or necessity; for when it has, perchance, after the sharpest competition, awarded a contract or privilege for any particular enterprise, such contract becomes at once a monopoly, because every other citizen of the state may not also do the work or furnish the material. In other words, to let any public work to the lowest bidder creates at once a monopoly, contrary to the Constitution. Under this reasoning, the successful bidder becomes ipso facto a monopolist, because, by virtue of his bid (the lowest made), he becomes entitled or operated to supply the article or do the work. If this grant to a publisher to furnish all the books needed in the schools was not coupled with a restriction upon price and other benefits to the citizen, then it might be denominated a "monopoly."

It is said that the arrangement made with the publisher is not a contract with the state, and the argument appears to be that the state has not bound herself in any way to the publisher, that it does not receive or pay for the books, and there is no contract between the publisher and the school boards nor with the patrons of the schools, and for this reason the privilege is invalid. Even if it be not a contract, in the sense that the state cannot be forced to comply with it, this would not invalidate the law. Bancroft v. Thayer, 5 Sawy. 502, Fed. Cas. No. 835. We think this contention, however, is not well made. The state frequently grants to railroads and other agencies privileges and concessions coupled with conditions in favor of the public, and so with municipalities in granting water rights and lighting rights, and rights to street-car companies. It is said there are no safeguards against extortion and oppression; but we have, in the first place, a letting at the lowest rates, in free competition, after public advertisement, and a further provision that the price shall always be as low as the books have ever been or are now being published under contract in any state, county, or district of the United States, when like conditions prevail. It is said that this term, "like conditions," is indefinite, and that it is not specified who is to be the judge as to whether the conditions are alike or not. But this, as well as the enforcement of the undertaking, is provided for in the fourth and eighth sections of the act, which empower the commission created by the act to sue for a breach of the contract at any time, and this commission is the judge of the conditions, as well as all breaches of the contract, by the terms of the act itself, subject, in all proper matters, to revision by the courts. It is said that to allow the state to prescribe the books, fix their prices, and let out the privilege of supplying them would establish a precedent that would lead to extreme results; that, if the state may thus control the books, it may in like manner provide the houses and desks, and a uniform for the students, and let out the privilege for furnishing them to some one individual. Grant this may be so. It is evident that someone must decide upon these matters, and provide the articles deemed necessary; and it simply resolves itself into the query whether the state, which provides and maintains the system, shall control and regulate it, or leave that duty to others, who, at last, are but its agents and representatives. Of course, we cannot presume, nor can any argument be based upon the assumption, that the state will go to absurd lengths; but the presumption is that the legislature, which more immediately represents the people, will do what it deems best for the people.

It is said the schools do not belong to the state, but to the people, and while, in a certain sense, this is true, it is, at last, but a play upon words. The system is inaugurated, operated, shaped, supported, and controlled by the state through its legislature, but for the benefit of the people, and, as in all other matters of public concern, the people act through their immediate representatives, the legislature.

It is said the fixing of the price is not at all necessary to the maintenance of the uniform series; that if the books are selected, and the patrons are left free to buy them in the open market, the best interest of the citizen will be conserved. But it is evident that such would not be the result in case of a copyright book, since they could only be obtained of the party having the right, and many of the best books are copyrighted; nor is it reasonable to suppose that individual buyers in open market could secure rates as low for a single book or a lot of books as can be obtained when the contract is for the entire publication, and all the books used, or any particular series. But this, after all, is a matter which addresses itself to the sound judgment of the legislature.

It is said the state has no right to prescribe that the citizen or consumer must pay cash in advance for an article he buys, and that credit is a matter of public right. It is evident that the requirement for a cash payment must be considered along with all the other features of the legislation, and that, if the payment of cash may seem arbitrary, it is not so, but enables the contractor to reduce his price, as he feels sure of his money, and that it will not be either delayed or rendered uncertain. Besides, the provision requiring cash payment only applies when books are ordered to be sent out of the county, when a depository is not located in it, in which case the book must be delivered free of expense of carriage.

It is said that it is not a function of government to pass statutes to secure cheap prices to the consumer, and this should be left to the laws of competition of supply and demand. This is but a statement of the main question in a different shape. We may grant that the state may not regulate prices of commodities generally, and may not legislate so as to secure cheap rates for the same; but this does not prevent the state from securing for the children of the state, who desire to enter the schools which it has provided for their benefit, favorable terms upon which they may enter and enjoy its benefits.

The next objection urged is that the act delegates legislative power to a commission and to the executive of the state. The main provisions of the act which bear upon this 48 L. R. A.

question are those which provide that a commission may select the books, make contracts for obtaining them, and perfect the details of the general plan of providing all schools with the books chosen, and obtain for pupils and patrons the lowest prices possible. As an incident to this, the commission and governor are to announce when the details have been arranged, so that the law may be put into operation. If we grant that the legislature has the power to prescribe and enforce the system, since it is one that requires the adjustment of many details, it is evident that such details can only be carried out by a commission. In such cases, the legislature can only act through boards and commissions or other agencies, and there can be no valid objection, unless legislative power is conferred upon the board.

It is said the act leaves it to the commission to say when it shall take effect. This, we think, is not a proper construction of it. The act takes effect from and after its passage, as do other acts. The commission has no power to delay its force as a law. It simply is authorized to report when it has consummated the preliminary work devolving upon it of selecting the course, making contracts for the books, fixing their price, designating the depositories, and otherwise prescribing the time and manner in which the patrons and children may begin to receive its advantages. This commission is given no power to delay the enforcement of the law beyond this limit. It is true it may do so, but this would be not in obedience to the law, but in violation of it. Suppose that the state should determine to erect a penitentiary or an asylum for the blind or deaf or insane, and should appoint a commission to select a site, to prepare plans, to employ an architect, to contract for buildings and erect them, to frame rules and regulations for the government of the inmates, and should direct that, when ready for occupation, the commission should, by public advertisement, announce the fact, so that the buildings could be put to the intended use, and that persons could be received therein; could this be called a delegation of legislative authority? We think not, and we fail to see any difference between the provisions of such an act and the present one. It does not delegate legislative power; that is, any power to pass or annul a law. There is a difference between a delegation of power to make laws involving, necessarily, a discretion as to what they shall be, and a grant of authority relating to their execution, though the latter may involve the exercise of discretion under and in pursuance of the law. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1029. Merely administrative or executive functions may be delegated. Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Clinton County Comrs. 1 Ohio St. 88. The difference between the power to pass a law and the power to adopt rules and regulations to carry into effect a law already passed is obvious. Georgia R. Co. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694. The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. Locke's Appeal, 72 Pa. 498, 13 Am. Rep. 716; in Moers v. Reading, 21 Pa. 202, it was said: "Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it cannot be said that the exercise of such a discretion is the making of the law." A notable instance of the delegation of such discretion and power to the executive is found in the case of Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 38 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495, wherein the president was authorized to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes to suspend, by proclamation, the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, when he would be satisfied that any country producing such articles imposed duties or exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States which he deemed to be reciprocally unequal or unreasonable. See the doctrine fully illustrated in 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 1029-1031, and cases there cited.

It is said the act denies local self-government. This, of course, is a general term, and no specific provision of the Constitution is referred to, upon this feature of the case, as being violated. It is said, in broad terms, that the people have an inherent fundamental and vested right to administer their own local affairs, as the people of each county and district shall deem right and proper. We cannot enter into a consideration of such general doctrine, but will attempt to discuss it so far as it touches upon the common-school system, and the manner of its execution. This system is supported in part by state funds, and in part by county taxes. But the latter, at last, are but state funds, provided by the state through the power delegated to the counties. It is insisted that heretofore there has been more or less local control and government of the public schools, but this local government was authorized by, and was the creature of, the statute, and the legislature is not precluded from framing other statutes, if it deem it wise to do so, modifying former plans. By the act of 1873, under which the present system was inaugurated, it was provided that there should be established and maintained in this state a uniform system of public schools, and that it should be administered by a state superintendent, county superintendents, and district directors. Shannon's Code, §§ 1401, 1402. The fund for school purposes was provided by the same act, and consists of the interest on the permanent school fund and all other moneys that may come into the state treasury for that purpose from any source whatever; treating the permanent school fund and the educational fund as one for all purposes of distribution. Act 1873, chap. 25, § 35; Shannon's Code, § 1391. The interest on the permanent school fund and school tax was augmented by a poll tax, and by fines and penalties in certain cases, and also by a tax by each county, when other taxes were not sufficient to sustain the schools for five months in the year. By the act of 1844, all school funds then existing, no matter from what source derived, were ordered to be deposited in the Bank of Tennessee for investment in state bonds. The proceeds of lands which had been sold under the acts of Congress became thenceforth a part of the capital of the bank. They became assets of the bank, and the counties which had deposited school-land funds became simple creditors of the bank, except so far as they might be enabled to identify bonds bought for them, and this they could never do. So that counties entitled to such special funds thereafter had no priority over other depositors of the bank or its general creditors. State v. Bank of Tennessee, 5 Baxt. 7, 31, 32. However this may be, the Constitution of 1870 and the act of 1873, recognizing the fact that the entire actual school fund originally existing had been lost by the fortunes of war and subsequent events, spoke into existence, by constitutional and legislative feat, a school fund of $2,512,500, which was made a permanent fund, and the faith of the state was pledged to the payment of interest upon that fund for the equal benefit of all the people of the state. This fund, thus spoken into existence, was for the benefit of every county and all the people equally. The constitutional provision of 1870 relating to it is as follows: "Knowledge, learning, and virtue, being essential to the preservation of republican institutions, and the diffusion of the opportunities and advantages of education throughout the different portions of the state being highly conducive to the promotion of this end, it shall be the duty of the general assembly, in all future periods of this government, to cherish literature and science. And the fund called the common-school fund, and all the lands and proceeds thereof, dividends, stock, and other property of every description whatever, heretofore by law appropriated by the general assembly of this state for the use of common schools, and all such as shall hereafter be appropriated, shall remain a perpetual fund, the principal of which shall never be diminished by legislative appropriation; and the interest thereof shall be inviolably appropriated to the support and encouragement of common schools throughout the state, and for the equal benefit of all the people thereof; and no law shall be made authorizing said fund or any part thereof to be diverted to any other use than the support and encouragement of common schools." Const. art. 11, § 12. Since the inauguration of the present system of public schools, in 1873, it has never been even suggested that the state and counties may have different systems and schools, the state operating a state school, and the county a county school, but the basic idea is that the county may supplement the state funds, so as to enlarge and improve the state schools. Carried to its logical result, the contention of counsel is that each county may have its own system, make its own rules, prescribe its own course of study, and, proceeding further, each school district may do the same, so that we may have as many systems in the state as there are school districts. This is carrying the doctrine of local government too far. By the same parity of reasoning, it might be said that each county may establish its own criminal laws, provide its own courts to execute the laws, and to deny them these rights would be to deny the right of local self-government. We are of opinion that the legislature, under the constitutional provision, may as well establish a uniform system of schools and a uniform administration of them, as it may establish a uniform system of criminal laws and of courts to execute them. The object of the criminal laws is, by punishment, to deter others from the commission of crimes, and thus preserve the peace, morals, good order, and well-being of society; and the object of the public-school system is to prevent crime, by educating the people, and thus, by providing and securing a higher state of intelligence and morals, conserve the peace, good order, and well-being of society. The prevention of crime, and preservation of good order and peace, is the highest exercise of the police power of the state, whether done by punishing offenders or educating the children. What is the scope and meaning of the term "police power" has never been defined. The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly declined to define its limits. Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079. In New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 139, 9 L. ed. 662, it is said: It embraces every law which concerns the welfare of the whole people of the state or any individual within it, whether it relates to their rights or duties, whether it respects them as men or citizens of the state, whether in their public or private relations, whether it relates to the rights of person or property of the whole people of the state or of any individual within it and upon the persons and things within it. In Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527, it is said: The police power of a state extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and to the protection of all property, within the state, and hence to the making of all regulations promotive of domestic order, morals, health, and safety. In Smith v. State, 100 Tenn. 505, 41 L. R. A. 432, 46 S. W. 566, it is said, in substance, that it extends to all questions of health, morals, safety, order, comfort, and well-being of the public, and that this enumeration does not make the list complete. Similar language has but recently been used in the case of Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co. (Tenn.) 53 S. W. 955, and this is no new doctrine, either in this state or in the United States. In Bancroft v. Thayer, 5 Sawy. 502, Fed. Cas. No. 835, it has been held that a state may provide by legislation that a designated person shall have the exclusive privilege of furnishing all the text-books needed for use of the public schools, and the court said: "To authorize and provide that, by means of contract or legislative grant, a particular person . . . shall have the exclusive right to do 48 L. R. A.

or furnish a particular thing, upon certain conditions, for the use and convenience of the public, has always been a common mode of exercising the police powers of the state." This question of providing a uniform series of text-books, and prescribing the manner in which it may be done, and the procuring of such books, and their distribution, as here done, is not a new one in the United States. It appears that more than twenty states have preceded Tennessee in passing uniform text-book laws. It is said that in some of them it has not resulted favorably, and the system has met with disfavor. How this is, is a matter which addresses itself to the legislature, and not to the court. With the wisdom and policy of the law we have nothing to do. In some of the states the validity and constitutionality of the acts have been called in question, and the material provisions of the law have been maintained. The subject is elaborately considered in the case of State ex rel. Clark v. Haworth, 122 Ind. 402, 7 L. R. A. 240, 23 N. E. 946, when the constitutionality of an act very similar to the one now under consideration was involved, and the arguments against it were much the same as are now made. The court very elaborately considered the provisions of the act and the objections raised, and sustained the act, citing many authorities in accord, and, among them, Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 225, note 1; Curryer v. Merrill, 25 Minn. 1, 33 Am. Rep. 450; State ex rel. Newnham v. State Bd. of Edu. 18 Nev. 173, 1 Pac. 844; People ex rel. Beckwith v. Oakland Bd. of Edu. 55 Cal. 331; People ex rel. Bellmer v. State Bd. of Edu. 49 Cal. 684. See also Baltimore City School Comrs. v. State Bd. of Edu. 26 Md. 505; State ex rel. Snook v. Blue, 122 Ind. 600, 23 N. E. 963; State ex rel. Roberts v. Springfield School Directors, 74 Mo. 21; State ex rel. Andrew v. Webber, 108 Ind. 31, 58 Am. Rep. 30, 8 N. E. 708; School Trustees v. People ex rel. Van Allen, 87 Ill. 303, 29 Am. Rep. 55; Jones v. Detroit Bd. of Edu. 88 Mich. 371, 50 N. W. 309; Effingham v. Hamilton, 68 Miss. 523, 10 So. 39.

The reasoning of the court in the principal case of State ex rel. Clark v. Haworth is so satisfactory and conclusive that we cannot perhaps do better than give a synopsis of it. It was held that such an act does not infringe in the slightest degree upon the right of local self-government; that essentially and intrinsically the schools, in which are educated and trained children who are to become rulers of the commonwealth, are matters of state, and not local, jurisdiction: that in such matters the state is a unit, and the legislature the source of power; that the establishment and control of public schools is a function of the general assembly, both under the Constitution and because it is a matter of state concern. Being a matter of legislative control, the legislature may abandon one plan, and try another, if it see proper, and the court cannot interfere. It is further pertinently said that it is impossible to conceive of the existence of a uniform system of public schools without power lodged somewhere to make it uniform, and, in the absence of express constitutional provisions, that power must necessarily reside in the legislature; and hence it has the power to prescribe the course of study, as well as the books to be used, and how they shall be obtained and distributed, and its discretion as to methods cannot be controlled by the courts; that such an act does not provide a benefit for book dealers, but its purpose is to secure such benefits for the public, and such benefits as may arise to any individual are merely incidental; that such statute is not within the constitutional provisions directed against monopolies, but that the purpose of the act is to secure books for the public schools by means of open competition, after full notice; no special privilege is granted, none denied,—all are invited to enter the field. The court says: "We can find neither reason nor authority that suggests a doubt as to the power of the legislature to require a designated series of books to be used in the schools, and to require that the books selected shall be obtained from the person to whom the contract for supplying them may be awarded. It is to be remembered that the statute does not command that every person shall buy the books. It confines the requirement to those who receive the benefit of the public schools. These schools are owned and maintained by the state, and the state may prescribe the terms and conditions upon which pupils may enter them, except that it cannot disregard the constitutional injunction, 'tuition shall be without charge and equally open to all.' It may, as we have seen, prescribe the course of study that shall be pursued, and the system of instruction that shall be adopted, and, to perfect and complete its control, it must have the power to prescribe the books that shall be used, and the mode in which the books shall be obtained. . . . The legislature simply commands that those who enjoy the benefit of the schools which it maintains shall secure such books as it deems best, and in the mode it regards as expedient. Power thus asserted is exercised in a matter which is not of common right, but which concerns institutions founded and fostered by the state. The regulation, in its entire scope, relates exclusively to the enjoyment of the privilege afforded by a system of education created and maintained by the state for the general good, and it must follow that the state does have power to make the regulations effective by prescribing the method which shall be pursued by those who seek to enjoy the privilege it has created. Certainly, no one will deny the existence of such a right, and, if it does exist, it must reside in the lawmaking power of the state."

The regulation of the mode of receiving books by the pupils of the common schools is not analogous to a regulation of general property rights; for books are peculiar to schools, and schools are the property of the state. It is no answer to this argument to affirm that the state may not give one person the exclusive privilege of selling fuel, clothing, or the like to a community; for school books are unlike such property in their chief characteristics, and the legislature does not assume to declare that any person may not sell books to a community. It simply assumes the power of declaring that the person whom the state board of education decides is the lowest bidder shall have the exclusive privilege of supplying its schools with books. In doing this, it does no more respecting schools than a private citizen does who contracts with another to furnish him goods for a designated period, nor does it do more regarding schools than it does with respect to all public institutions whose officers are authorized to give the exclusive privilege of furnishing groceries, medicines, or other articles to the person to whom a contract covering a designated period is awarded; for the state owns and maintains its schools just as much as it does its public institutions of every kind.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion the act is valid and constitutional, and there is no error in the judgment of the court below, and it is affirmed, with costs.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Henry H. HARRIS.

(184 Ill. 57.)

The communication of Texas fever by infected cars to cattle transported in them renders the railroad company liable for the damages.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, which affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court for Champaign County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of cattle shipped over defendant's road, from fever alleged to have been communicated to them from infected cars. Affirmed.

As to statutory duty with reference to care of stock during transportation, see Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. American Exch. Bank (Va.) 44 L. R. A. 449, and note.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John G. Drennan, with Messrs. Wolfe & Savage, for appellant:

When circumstantial evidence is relied on to found an inference as to the main fact the circumstances themselves cannot be presumed.

In such cases the facts from which the inference is to be drawn must be proved by direct evidence as if they were the very facts in issue.

Starkie, Ev. p. 80; United States v. Ross, 92 U. S. 281, 23 L. ed. 707; Globe Acoi. Ins. Co. v. Gerisch, 163 Ill. 629, 45 N. E. 563; Lawson, Presumptive Ev. p. 652.

The trial and appellate courts have fallen into the error of presuming that this car carried infected cattle, and further presuming that they came from an infected part of the country; and further presuming that such carriage was within a time to have communicated the disease, which, with the circumstances proved by direct evidence, enabled them to presume the car infected as alleged.

This is not a legal method of sustaining a verdict.

Messrs. Gere & Philbrick for appellee.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the appellate court affirming a judgment of the circuit court of Champaign county, wherein the appellee recovered damages against the Illinois Central Railroad Company for the loss of a lot of cattle shipped by appellee over appellant's railroad in cars alleged to have been infected with a cattle disease known as "Texas fever." It appears that appellee purchased 114 head of cattle near Centralia and Edgewood, in this state, and on September 30, 1898, shipped the cattle, in cars furnished by the Illinois Central Railroad Company, from those two points to Seymour, Illinois. When the cattle arrived at Seymour they were taken directly from the cars to the farm of appellee, and turned into his pasture. On October 13 some 5 or 7 of them were sick, and the symptoms were splenic or Texas fever. The 114 cattle that were shipped over appellant's road were then placed by themselves. Subsequently 26 of these cattle died of splenic or Texas fever. Thirty-three, in all, were affected with the disease.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendant asked the court to give the jury the following instruction: "That, under the law and evidence, plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and the verdict must be, 'Not guilty.'" The court refused the instruction, and defendant excepted. The refusal of the court to give the instruction is the only question relied upon by the appellant to reverse the judgment. In requesting the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and all inferences to be properly drawn therefrom, were admitted; and, in passing upon an application to take a case from the jury, we 48 L. R. A.

do not consider or pass upon the weight of the evidence. Offutt v. World's Columbian Exposition, 175 Ill. 472, 51 N. E. 651. In such case the real question is whether the evidence, with all inferences to be properly drawn therefrom, fairly tended to prove plaintiff's cause of action as set out in his declaration. If it does, then it is the duty of the court to refuse to take the case from the jury. Here, when appellee applied to appellant, as a common carrier, to ship his cattle, it was the duty of appellant to furnish reasonably safe cars in which the cattle might be transported, and it was also the duty of appellant to furnish cars which were not infected with any contagious cattle disease; and if appellant failed to discharge its duty, and appellee was injured in consequence of such failure, then appellee is entitled to recover such damages as he may have sustained. Upon looking into the record, it will be found, from the evidence, that the appellant's line of road extends from Chicago to New Orleans, and that appellant's cars in which the cattle were shipped had recently been used by the company in carrying other cattle. It also appears that the cattle purchased by appellee and shipped were native cattle, all raised in the localities where they were purchased; that no Texas fever had existed in those localities for more than twenty-five years; that these cattle were shipped by the appellee from the points where they were loaded, to Seymour, Illinois; that they were unloaded and immediately taken to appellee's pasture; and, further, that Texas or splenic fever had not existed or been known at the point where these cattle were unloaded, or at the pasture of appellee where the cattle were put, or in that section of the country, for more than twenty-five years last past; that the cattle for which a recovery was asked died of Texas fever. From the facts thus established, the logical inference would be that the disease of which the cattle died was communicated to them from appellant's cars, infected by the germs of the disease which were in the cars. The evidence points to no other source from which the disease could have been communicated to the cattle. The evidence demonstrates to a certainty that the cattle could not have contracted the disease before they entered appellant's cars. It also establishes beyond dispute that they did not contract the disease after they left the cars. Such being the case, the cattle must necessarily have contracted the disease on the cars, from germs which had been left in the cars from recent shipments. We think, therefore, the jury were fully warranted in finding from the evidence that appellant's cars were infected with the disease, and that it was communicated to plaintiff's cattle in the cars. From what has been said, it follows that the court did not err in refusing appellant's instruction.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

I. Scope of note.

This note is confined to the question of inconsistencies in the same pleading, either in the same or different counts. The question under common-law practice as to the effect of pleading in abatement and in bar turns upon the theory that a plea in bar is a waiver of a plea in abatement, and not upon any idea of inconsistency, and is not therefore included, and the reason why general and special pleas in the same answer are sometimes held improper is based upon the language of the statute providing that a party may plead generally or specially, rather than on any idea of inconsistency. And the question of difference between pleas and APPEAL by defendant Jones from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount of certain promissory notes and to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thompson, Edsen, & Humphries, with Messrs. James Leddy and Gleason & Babcock, for appellants:

The respondent bank alleged in its amended complaint that prior to the maturity of the notes in suit the said Griffith, Bluett, and Remsburg, as such committee, for a valuable consideration, duly indorsed and delivered the said promissory notes to it, and it became, ever since has amended pleas and subsequent pleadings by the same party is one of departure rather than inconsistency, and cases with reference to such pleas are not included in this note, unless it appears in the particular case that the question of consistency was involved.

II. Inconsistency in single plea.

Neither under the old common-law practice, nor under the statute of Anne, adopted by nearly if not all the states as common law, nor under the Codes of the different states, did the general rule that a defendant may make as many defenses as he sees proper, and that the pleas are not objectionable because of repugnancy or inconsistency, apply to single pleas; a single plea was always required to be consistent with itself. Ansley v. Bank of Piedmont, 113 Ala. 467, 21 So. 59; Hensley v. Tartar, 14 Cal. 503; Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671; Buhne v. Corbett, 43 Cal. 264; People ex rel. Crawford v. Lothrop, 3 Colo. 428; Tucker v. Edwards, 7 Colo. 209, 3 Pac. 233; McIlroy v. Buckner, 35 Ark. 555; Hillebrant v. Booth, 7 Tex. 499; Porter v. McCreehy, Code Rep. N. S. 88; Buddington v. Davis, 6 How. Pr. 401.

And a plea in an answer which is open to two intendments is to be construed most strongly against the defendant. United States v. Linn, 1 How. 104, 11 L. ed. 64; Fowler v. Dav-enport, 21 Tex. 620, dictum.

And an affidavit of defense admitting at the outset an indebtedness of a certain amount to the plaintiff, but asserting in conclusion that the defendant does not owe the plaintiff a cent, is clearly contradictory, and judgment will be entered notwithstanding the affidavit. Kelly v. Singer Mfg. Co. 4 Pa. Dist. R. 440.

So, a claim for damages ex contractu cannot be set up as a defense in an answer, and be united in the same plea with a claim of tort. Ansley v. Bank of Piedmont, 113 Ala. 467, 21 So. 59.

And a denial of a corrupt, usurious, and illegal agreement, or of a device, shift, or contrivance to evade the usury laws, can have little or no effect, if, from the facts which are admitted, it follows that the statute has been violated; and such denials cannot be deemed denials of matters of fact, but are denials of inferences of law from the facts only. Manice v. New York Dry Dock Co. 8 Edw. Ch. 144.

And while civil death abates an action for personal tort, an answer averring that the defendant is civilly dead contains two contradictory averments, it being a fiction of law that the act of answering by a defendant, though by been, and now is, the owner and holder of said promissory notes. These allegations are denied by the appellant in his amended answer, and, before a recovery can be had against him, the allegations of the complaint must be proved as alleged.

Messrs. Carr & Preston and W. R. Bell, for respondent:

That Griffith was authorized to discount the notes cannot be doubted on the evidence.

attorney, is a conclusive averment that he is neither civilly nor physically dead, and therefore the averment that he is civilly dead must be deemed untrue. Freeman v. Frank, 10 Abb. Pr. 370.

And a demurrer admits the allegations in the answer when contradictory only when the law adjudges them to be true, and therefore it does not admit the allegation of a defendant in his answer that he is civilly dead. Ibid.

So, a scilicet repugnant to the matter precedent to it is void on demurrer, as well as after verdict. Cutler v. Southern, 1 Lev. 194.

And a plea in an action on a note, of failure of consideration, alleging that the consideration of the note has failed, or that it was given on the purchase of certain notes, accounts, and land papers belonging to the plaintiff's intestate, which were sold by her at public sale, and that there was no sale or delivery by the plaintiff of anything whatever, and that the consideration of the note was entirely different from that before alleged, is in itself inconsistent, and is rightly rejected by the court. Hillebrant v. Booth, 7 Tex. 499.

And a paragraph of an answer in an action on a note in which a denial that the note had any consideration to support it appears in direct connection with a plea of non est factum is inconsistent with itself, making it the duty of the court to require the defendant to paragraph the answer so as to enable the plaintiff to know what defenses are being relied on; and where he objects to striking out the paragraph, and to filing a reply to it, and his objection is sustained, the only issue is that of non est factum, and a judgment non obstante verdicto on the ground that the defense of want of consideration was confessed should not be granted. Mullikin v. Mullikin, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 612, 25 S. W. 598.

A denial of the full amount claimed in an action, however, and an admission of a certain amount to be due, and a tender of that amount, constitute but a single defense, and the allegations cannot be separated, and are not subject to objection for inconsistency. Spencer v. Tooker, 12 Abb. Pr. 353.

III. Original common-law rule as to inconsistency between pleas.

The original common-law rule, strictly observed for ages, was that a defendant could plead only one plea without infringing the rule against duplicity. Auburn & O. Canal Co. v. Leitch, 4 Denio, 65. This, of course, brought every pleading by a defendant directly within the rule laid down in supra, I., that a single plea must not be inconsistent with itself. This original common-law rule of pleading, however, is entirely obsolete, having been entirely superseded by statutory enactments, and the cases laying it down and supporting it have therefore been omitted from this note, and the rule itself is of importance only with reference to the origin and history of existing rules.

IV. The rule under the statute of Anne.

a. With reference to inconsistent facts.

By the statute of 4 Anne, chap. 16, § 4, it was provided that "it shall be lawful for any defendant or tenant in any action or suit, or for any plaintiff in replevin in any court of record, with leave of the court, to plead as many several matters thereto as he shall think necessary for his defense."

This statute superseded the original common-law rule, and has since substantially remained the rule of pleading in England, and was adopted by most, if not all, of the United States as common law, and probably still remains the rule of pleading in such states as have retained the common-law system. The cases decided under it therefore, though arising in states in which it has been superseded by the enactment of Codes, are still authoritative, and they are here included so far as they bear upon the question of inconsistent defenses.

Under these rules of pleading a defendant might set up any number of grounds of defense which are not inconsistent with each other. Yocum v. Morice, 4 Phila. 100; Auburn & O. Canal Co. v. Leitch, 4 Denio, 65.

But the courts exercised a controlling power over a defendant who sought to plead inconsistent matters, and it was discretionary with them to receive or reject the inconsistent pleas which were tendered. Furniss v. Ellis, 2 Brock. 14, Fed. Cas. No. 5,162; Lincoln v. Wilamowicz, 7 Ark. 378, dictum; Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188, dictum; Jenkins v. Edwards, 5 T. R. 97.

And it has been said that the court would take care not to permit a defendant to plead inconsistently. Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188.

And it would appear to have been the rule of the earlier cases under that statute that incompatible pleas were not to be allowed, whether the inconsistency was one of fact, consisting of an express contradiction, or one of law, arising from admissions by implication of law.

Authority to discount such paper includes authority to indorse it.

Merchants' Bank v. Central Bank, 1 Ga. 418, 44 Am. Dec. 665; Story, Agency, §§ 59, 77; Bayley, Bills & Notes, 5th ed. chaps. 2, 7; Mechem, Agency, § 391.

The general allegations in a pleading give way to special allegations upon the same subject.

A general or specific denial in an answer is always controlled by an affirmative allegation inconsistent with it.

The rights of the respondent with respect to these notes are determined by the facts known to it at the time it took the paper, and the manner in which it took it, and the amount paid for it.

The giving of the debtor's own note, bill, requisite to the introduction of new matter in defense.

Thus, where facts are alleged in an answer, which from their nature must be within the personal knowledge of the defendant, and which if true are a complete answer to the claim, he will not be permitted to set up in addition another set of facts inconsistent with the previous defenses, but will be required to elect upon which he will rely. Arnold v. Dimon, 4 Sandf. 680.

And matter in avoidance cannot be set up in an answer when the matter it seeks to avoid is denied. Roe v. Rogers, 8 How. Pr. 356; Arthur v. Brooks, 14 Barb. 533.

And a plea of tender cannot be pleaded with the general issue to the whole declaration because the tender confesses the amount due. Williams v. Harria, 2 How. (Miss.) 627, dictum.

So, a defendant in an action on a bond was not permitted to plead non est factum and a tender as to part. Jenkins v. Edwards, 5 T. R. 97.

And the pleas of non est factum and tender, in an action of covenant for the nonpayment of rent, were inconsistent, and could not be united in the same answer. Orgill v. Kemshead, 4 Taunt. 459.

Non assumpsit or non est factum and a tender were not permitted to be pleaded together on the ground that the one goes to deny any cause of action and the other admits it, and that if the general issue should be found for the defendant it would appear on the record in the action of assumpsit that no debt was due, in the face of the defendant's admission by the plea of tender that something was due; that there never existed such a bond as that declared on, when the plea of tender admits something to be due on that very bond. Union Bank v. Ridgely, 1 Harr. & G. 324, dictum.

And a mandamus would not issue from the Supreme Court of the United States to a district judge directing him to restore to the record a plea of tender which had been filed together with a plea of non est factum. Ex parte Davenport, 6 Pet. 661, 8 L. ed. 537.

And pleas of non est factum and solvit post dictum in debt on a bond were incompatible, and could not be pleaded together. Fox v. Chandler, 2 W. Bl. 905; Arnold v. Baas, 2 W. Bl. 903.

So, an allegation in an action for trespass that the lands in suit were copyhold, and another allegation that they were descendible, were inconsistent and repugnant. Hutchinson v. Jackson, 2 Lut. No. 1324.

And a plea in an action for trespass and false imprisonment that the plaintiff was an alien enemy could not be united with a special justification that, the plaintiff having committed a felony, the defendant gave him in charge of a constable to be taken before a magistrate. Truckenbrodt v. Payne, 12 East, 206.

The defendant in an action for trespass should have confessed the trespass if he meant to justify or avoid it, or denied it altogether. The general issue and a justification, as these defenses were understood before the enactment of the Code, could not be united in the same answer, as both could not be true at the same time. Royce v. Brown, 8 How. Pr. 391.

So, in Prinnel v. Preston, Barnes's Notes, 351, which was a motion for leave to plead not guilty and a license in trespass, it was said that the court has never admitted not guilty and a release of a particular trespass, though it has admitted not guilty and a general release where an affidavit was produced; but the motion seems to have been decided upon the absence of an affidavit showing the necessity of both defenses.

Likewise, a plea in bar on a writ of entry sur disclaim under leave to plead double of the general issue, that the demandant was never seised of the demanded premises in manner and form as he in his declaration has alleged, where the answer contained a previous plea of the general issue of nul disclaim, which was joined by the demandant, was bad and subject to demurrer as putting in issue a fact which must be proved under the first issue. Martin v. Woods, 6 Mass. 6.

And where an answer to a bill filed for an account for tithes sets up certain yearly payments as moduses, but insists that if the same for any reason were not good and valid moduses from time immemorial they must be taken to have been payable as a good and valid real composition made with the assent of all the parties, the two allegations are inconsistent, and the latter branch cannot be rejected as surplusage, but must be taken as an admission entitling the plaintiff to a decree. Jesus College v. Gibbs, 1 Younge & C. Exch. 160.

And leave to plead double was not granted under the statute of Anne, where the plaintiff's title to an advowson was traced through a period of two centuries, and the defendant's claim arose on the alleged invalidity of a particular deed so as to permit the defendant to traverse all the allegations in the declaration, or to plead more pleas than were necessary to contest that particular deed. Gully v. Exeter, 5 Bing. 42.

or check, or the note, bill, or check of a third person, to meet an antecedent indebtedness, is prima facie not a payment or discharge of such indebtedness.

First Nat. Bank v. Newton, 10 Colo. 161, 14 Pac. 428; Byrne v. Van Hoesen, 5 Johns. 66; Jaffrey v. Cornish, 10 N. H. 505; Woodward v. Milce, 24 N. H. 289; Collins v. Dawley, 4 Colo. 141, 34 Am. Rep. 72; Hart v. Boller, 15 Serg. & R. 162, 16 Am. Dec. 536; Sutton v. The Albatross, 2 Wall. Jr. 327, Fed. Cas. No. 13,645; Fickling v. Brewer, 38 Ala. 685; White v. Jones, 38 Ill. 159; Matthews v. Dure, 20 Md. 248; Schilling v. Durst, 42 Pa. 126; McMurray v. Taylor, 30 Mo. 263, 77 Am. Dec. 611; Kephart v. Butcher, 17 Iowa, 240; Welch v. Allington, 23 Cal. 322; Peter v. Beverly, 10 Pet. 562, 9 L. ed. 534; Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch, 253, 3 L. ed. 215; The Kimball, 3 Wall. 45, sub nom. Duncan v. Kimball, 18 L. ed. 54.

So, a plea of non est factum, denying the execution of a deed, and a plea of conditions performed, admitting its execution, cannot be pleaded together. Pope v. Latham, 1 Ark. 66.

Nor can payment and non est factum be pleaded to a deed. Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188, dictum.

And an averment in an answer in an action on a delivery bond that all the defendant's property was not worth $100 was inconsistent with a subsequent averment that his property, exclusive of that levied on, did not amount in value to $100, and rendered the answer subject to objection by demurrer. Barber v. Summers, 5 Blackf. 339.

So, a plea of tender in an action on contract admitted the contract to the extent of the sum tendered, and was therefore inconsistent with a denial of the whole demand, and the two pleas cannot be united in the same answer. Chew v. Close, 9 Phila. 211.

And the defendant in an action in assumpsit could not plead non assumpsit of all the counts, and a tender as to a part of them. Dowgall v. Bowman, 3 Wils. 145; Maclellan v. Howard, 4 T. R. 195.

The reason for the rule being that if the general issue should be found under such plea for the defendant, it would then appear on the record that no debt was due, and yet that the defendant admitted something to be due. Maclellan v. Howard, 4 T. R. 195.

But where a defendant in an action of assumpsit pleaded non assumpsit and payment or set-off, failure on his part to prove set-off was not an acknowledgment of the plaintiff's debt which the plaintiff might give in evidence. Rogers v. Old, 5 Serg. & R. 411.

So, a plea of tender in an action for debt admitted that the plaintiff had a locus standi in court as to part of the demands, and a plea of alien enemy denied that he had any right to stand in court or to recover anything, and the two were therefore repugnant, and could not stand together. Shombeck v. De La Cour, 10 East, 326.

And where several defendants in an action of debt had joined in pleas in bar, one of them could not afterwards sever and put in a plea going to his personal discharge as a discharge under the insolvent act. Andrus v. Waring, 20 Johns. 153.

Nor was a plea in an action upon a promissory note admitting part of the sum sued for, taken in connection with a plea of the general issue and of failure of consideration, good on 48 L. R. A.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was originally begun by the respondent in the equity department of King county, but, some questions of fact arising for determination between the appellant and the respondent, it was transferred to the law department in the superior court of said county. The notes in suit were made by the appellant as a subscription in aid of an enterprise in which he and a number of other persons were interested, viz., the building of a boulevard along the west shore of Lake Union. At a meeting of those interested in the enterprise, at which appellant was present, he subscribed $2,500 towards carrying on the enterprise, and a committee was elected and appointed by the meeting as an executive committee to have full charge and control of the work. This committee consisted of L. H. Griffith, Edward Bluet, and demurrer, as it was incompatible with them all. Williams v. Harris, 2 How. (Miss.) 627.

And where defendant sued upon a promissory note pleads the general issue with notice of set-off, and at a later stage puts in a special plea ipse darrein continuance, and sets up a composition made with the plaintiff and other creditors under the bankruptcy act, by interposing the second plea, he abandons the first, and places the issue of the suit entirely on the new plea, the second plea being virtually a confession of the cause of action; and in such case an award of final judgment in favor of the plaintiff is the legitimate result in point of law. Whittemore v. Stephens, 48 Mich. 574, 12 N. W. 858.

And a plea in an action by the drawer against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, that before the acceptance it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff should consign certain goods to a designated person, and that out of the proceeds of such goods the plaintiff should direct the consignee to pay to the defendant the amount of the bill, and that if the proceeds should not arrive in the country when the bill was due the plaintiff should renew the bill, alleging that they did not arrive at that time, and that the plaintiff declined to renew, and that it was thereupon agreed that the defendant should direct the consignee to pay the whole of the proceeds to the plaintiff, and that such direction and payments were made pursuant thereto, is repugnant to another plea in the same answer, that the defendant had not received any consideration for the payment of the bill, and the answer is subject to special demurrer. Byas v. Wylie, 1 Cramp. M. & R. 686, 8 Dowl. P. C. 524, 5 Tyrw. 377, 1 Gale, 50.

So, in Chitty v. Hume, 13 East, 255, which was an action on a bond in which the defendant caused delay by insisting upon oyer of the original instead of a sworn copy of the bond, and pleaded by leave of the court non est factum, solvit ad diem, and solvit post diem, the court in view of the delay, and of the further delay which might be occasioned by taking the depositions of subscribing witnesses in a foreign country, and upon an affidavit that part payments had been made, rescinded the rule for pleading double in order to make the defendant elect to stand either upon his plea of non est factum or of payment.

And in Anderson v. Anderson, 2 W. Bl. 1157, leave to plead in dower that the deceased was not seised of the premises in which dower was claimed, together with a plea denying the marriage, was denied, the denial having been placed by one of the judges upon the ground of inconsistency. And the same thing was denied in Hillier v. Fletcher, 2 W. Bl. 1207.

C. E. Rensburg. The committee, through its manager, Griffith, afterwards sold the notes given by appellant to respondent, the Seattle National Bank. The notes were made payable to the order of the members of the committee. One of the notes sued on is a renewal of the note, made payable three months after its date. The renewal was made after the maturity of the original note, and while it was held by respondent. The other note was made payable six months after date. Griffith indorsed on the back of each note the following: "L. H. Griffith, Edward Bluett, C. E. Rensburg, Committee, by L. H. Griffith, Chairman," and delivered them, so indorsed, to the respondent, and received from the respondent the sum of $2,500, the full face of the notes. This money was deposited to the credit of the treasurer of the boulevard enterprise, and was expended in prosecuting that enterprise.

And in Robins v. Crutchley, 2 Wils. 118, similar pleas in an action of dower were held bad on demurrer.

As to general denial and an averment that the taking of personal property was justifiable under the statute of Anne, see Foster v. Henry (N. Y.) 5 Alb. L. J. 173, infra, VI. c. 5.

Attention is here called to the fact that several of the cases above set forth were decided after the adoption of the reform procedure in their respective states. They are here included because decided before the principles of reform procedure were thoroughly understood, and when the courts were trying to apply to it the principles of the former practice, and because therefore such cases constitute, as will be seen by comparison with the later cases, an exposition of the former rules of pleading, rather than of Code pleading.

b. With reference to different modes of trial.

Under the common-law system of pleading, as well as under the statute of Anne, if different pleas or defenses in an action raised issues triable by a different method or a different form of action, or by a different court, they were regarded as inconsistent, and the pleader would be required to elect between them.

Thus, two pleas in the same action were not admissible if they presented different issues that must be tried by different courts. Chapman v. Sloan, 2 N. H. 464.

A defendant was not allowed to plead several pleas which required different trials, as nisi record and payment, in an action on a judgment, and he would in such case be put to an election between his pleas. Parks v. McClellan, 44 N. J. L. 552; Riley v. Riley, 20 N. J. L. 114.

And he could not plead nisi record and give notice that he would rely upon proof of the same facts in bar, where the plea under which he proposed to give the special matter in evidence was to be determined by the court upon an inspection of the record, while the facts to be given under the general plea were matters for the consideration of the jury. Card v. Sargant, 15 Vt. 393.

So, notice of special matter could not be given with a plea of nisi record in an action of debt on a judgment, as such notice could only

George R. Carter and Nellie Phinney, as the executrix of the last will and testament of Guy C. Phinney, deceased, were made defendants for the purpose of reforming and foreclosing a certain mortgage given as security for the notes in question; but they have not appealed from the judgment rendered, and need not be further noticed in this opinion. The amended complaint alleged that, prior to the maturity of the notes in suit, the said Griffith, Bluett, and Rensburg, as such committee, for a valuable consideration, duly indorsed and delivered the said promissory notes to plaintiff, and plaintiff then became, and now is, and ever since has been, the owner and holder of said promissory notes. These allegations are denied by general denial in the amended answer of the appellant, and on this denial the principal point in this case is raised.

We have examined the testimony in this accompany a plea which presented an issue to be tried by a jury. Barheydt v. Haverly, 1 Wend. 70.

The plea of nisi record was not that general issue intended by the New York statute under which the defendant was authorized to give notice of special matter of defense of which he intended to give evidence at the trial, the statute referring only to issues triable by the country. Raymond v. Smith, 13 Johns. 329.

Likewise, in Le Conte v. Pendleton, 1 Johns. Cas. 104, the defendant in an action of debt on a judgment obtained in another state was required to elect between a plea of nisi record and nisi debit, and one of the pleas was ordered stricken out.

And in Carnes v. Duncan, Col. Cas. 35, it was held that nisi record could not be pleaded with any other defenses.

But, the ground upon which a defendant was compelled to elect between a plea nisi record and other pleas, was that their mode of trial was different, one being by the record and the others by jury, and as the existence of a justice's judgment was not determinable at bar by the record a plea of nisi record to a declaration on a judgment in a justice's court was not triable by record but by jury, and might be joined with a plea in abatement. Witherwax v. Averill, 6 Cow. 589.

And non est factum and nisi record might be pleaded together in an action upon a bond which was by record in court. Brown v. Bickie, 7 Ark. 410.

And an issue of nisi record, being an issue of fact, was not inconsistent with another plea of an insolvent discharge, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stats. p. 409, § 4, so as to require the court to rule that the defendant must elect between them, as under that act the distinctions as to the trial of facts were abolished, and all issues of fact were triable by jury. Trotter v. Mills, 6 Wend. 512.

So, under the former practice a defendant in ejectment could not, in an answer denying the plaintiff's legal title, set up an equitable defense looking to affirmative relief, for the reason, among others, that the equitable issue would require a different mode of trial. Cochran v. Webb, 4 Sandf. 653.

And an answer in an action by an indorsee against the maker of a note, averring that the note was made and indorsed in blank and given to a third person to secure a sum of money borrowed from him by the defendant, and that such third person had not assigned his interest case in minutiae, and believe that it is sufficient to sustain all the contentions of the respondent as to the manner of executing the notes, the reason for their execution, the authority conferred upon Griffith, the manager of the committee, to transfer the notes, and in every other particular. On all these propositions, it is true, the testimony is conflicting; but we think it would be sufficient to sustain the verdict, even if the law of the case were as contended by appellant. But as the question of inconsistent defenses is raised squarely in this case, and has been argued with much zeal and ability by the attorneys on both sides, we have concluded to enter upon an investigation of that question and settle the law, so far as this state is concerned, on that proposition. Cases from this court are cited by both counsel to sustain their respective contentions, but but was the real creditor, and a plea of usury taken by such third person upon the loan paid the defendant, was bad and subject to demurrer, as the plea of usury was not triable in the whole by the mode of trial to which the defendant refers himself. Binney v. Merchant, 6 Mass. 190.

c. Relaxation of the rule.

The tendency of the more modern cases, as well as some of the older ones, has been to relax the strict rule with reference to inconsistent pleas formerly adopted under the statute of Anne, and it is thought that the rule may now be said to be, even under the rule of law supplied by that act, that the union of pleas will be permitted unless there is an inconsistency of fact as distinguished from an inconsistency by application of law.

Thus, as early as about the year 1800 it was said in Wilson v. Aimes, 5 Taunt. 340, 1 Marsh. 74, that the rule of strict consistency in pleading has been much relaxed, and a defendant in an action for rent may now be permitted to plead non tenure, nothing in arrear, and infancy in the same answer.

And in Butt's Case, 7 Coke, 25a, it was held that an answer pleading a grant of the rent out of a term of years, and also alleging that by virtue thereof he was seized in his demesne as a freehold for the term of his life, is not bad for repugnancy.

And in Cooke v. Sayer, 2 Burr. 753, an answer pleading not guilty, and also the statute of limitations, was held good on demurrer.

And in Gerring v. Manning, Barnes's Notes, 366, which was an action for trespass, a rule absolute was granted giving the defendant leave to plead not guilty and tender of amends.

So, in Martin v. Kesterton, 2 W. Bl. 1089, it was said that a tender is a very conscientious plea and ought to have every indulgence, and the court, in the exercise of its discretion, permitted a plea of not guilty and one of tender to be united in the same answer in an action in trespass, notwithstanding the seeming inconsistencies.

And in Dye v. Leatherdall, 3 Wils. 20, which was an action for trespass, a plea of not guilty, coupled with another plea that the defendants took the plaintiff's hog damage feasant and impounded it, was upheld on demurrer.

And in Steele v. Pindar, Barnes's Notes, 347, a plea of not guilty and one of general release from one of the plaintiffs were held not to be absolutely contradictory on motion for permission to plead double, where the release was general whatever may have been said by this court on this subject heretofore has been of the character of dicta, or an incidental reference to a question which was not material to the decision of the case under discussion. So we feel at liberty to enter upon its investigation as an original proposition. The answer, as we have said, denies that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of said notes, or that they had been indorsed and delivered to it for a valuable consideration, or otherwise. The court in its instructions, to which the appellant duly excepted, charged the jury that under the pleadings in this case the only question for their consideration was the question of whether the notes were paid. The defendant, after his general denial, which was upon information and belief, affirmatively alleges the transfer of the notes to the plaintiff. He alleges, in and not particular, and that it could not be given in evidence under the plea of not guilty.

And in Nagle v. Edwards, 3 Anstr. 702, in which inconsistent defenses were interposed and the answer was objected to on that ground, and it was insisted that it ought to be rejected as a whole, the court went into the defense upon its appearing that there had been no intentional misconduct, and that the inconsistency arose wholly from the mistake of legal advisers.

And in Wright v. Russell, 3 Wils. 536, 2 W. Bl. 923, which was an action of debt upon an obligation against a surety for the honesty of a clerk to a brewer, an answer, in which the defendant pleaded, first that the obligation was not his deed, and second that at the time of the making of the alleged obligation the plaintiff carried on the trade of the brewer on his own account only without a partner, and that while he so carried on the business the clerk served him honestly and justly, was held to be good.

So, under the more relaxed rule a plea of non est factum may be joined with a plea of payment in an action of covenant. Merry v. Gay, 3 Pick. 388.

And while pleading a general denial and a justification in an action for trespass was not allowed at common law, it was subsequently permitted by the statute of Anne, and is believed to be legitimate in all systems which allow several pleas in defense. Graah v. Sater, 6 Iowa, 302.

So, the defendant in an action for debt for work and labor and money paid to his use, might plead, first the general issue, and second that the demand accrued for carrying into effect illegal wagers, without inconsistency. Triebner v. Duerr, 1 Bing. N. C. 266, 1 Scott, 102, 3 Dowl. P. C. 133.

And the inconsistency and incompatibility of the pleas of general performance and of non est factum in an action of debt, were not such under the statute of Anne, 16, or under the statute of Maryland on the subject, as to prevent their being pleaded together in the same answer. Union Bank v. Ridgely, 1 Harr. & G. 324.

Nor were a plea of ne unques executor in an action for debt brought against a defendant as executor, and a plea of non est factum, repugnant so that a defendant who had filed the earlier plea would be refused leave to also file the latter. Langford v. Frey, 8 Humph. 444.

So, under the statute of Anne, chap. 16, § 4, which is a part of the common law of the state of Maine, inconsistent pleas were allowed, and his first affirmative defense, that the notes were executed and delivered to L. H. Griffith, Edward Bluett, and C. E. Remsburg, and that, subsequently to the execution and delivery of the said notes, the said committee transferred them to the plaintiff, and, in another paragraph of the same affirmative defense, alleges the payment of these notes by L. H. Griffith to the respondent. The averment of the transfer of the notes to the respondent is repeated in the second affirmative defense, where it is also alleged that the respondent, for a valuable consideration, extended the time of payment of the notes, and by reason of such extension of time the appellant claims that he is exonerated from the payment of the notes. The allegation of transfer is again repeated in the third affirmative defense, and an agreement for the settlement and the compromise.

mere inconsistency between two pleas was not an objection to their being pleaded together. Granite State Bank v. Otis, 58 Me. 133.

And under that act in force in Pennsylvania though it was formerly the practice of the court to refuse leave when the proposed pleas were inconsistent, in modern practice it will be permitted notwithstanding an apparent repugnancy, growing out of a plea of not guilty and a justification. Peters v. Ulmer, 73 Pa. 403.

And where an action is brought upon a promissory note against a prior indorser, and the defendant enters a plea of payment, and afterwards, but before trial, dies, his administrator should be permitted on motion to add the plea of non assumpsit so as to compel the plaintiff to prove the intestate's liability, and enable the administrator to meet such proof. Smith v. Kessler, 44 Pa. 142.

The discretion vested in the court by the statute of Anne to refuse leave to put in more than one plea is a legal discretion not to be exercised unless good reason exists. Peters v. Ulmer, 74 Pa. 403.

So, the court, in its discretion, may, under the South Carolina system of pleading, grant a motion to plead double at any time, and a plea of non demisit in an action for rent and a plea of no rent in arrear are not so inconsistent that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, will refuse to permit them to be pleaded together. Van Holten v. Lewis, 1 McCord, L. 12.

And a defendant can plead under the West Virginia statute, which is the same in substance as 4 and 5 Anne, as many matters of law and fact as to him may seem necessary to his defense, and the facts stated in one or more of them cannot be used as evidence or as admissions to disprove anything contained in the others, or to sustain plaintiff's declarations; and where a defendant has pleaded not guilty in an action of trespass for taking and carrying away the goods of another, and also specially pleaded justification by reason of being in the service of the confederate states of America, and the demurrer sustained, plaintiff should not be permitted to offer the special pleas in evidence to prove the trespass, and the defendant is not estopped by such special pleas on the issue joined on the plea of not guilty from denying the trespass, and where the plaintiff fails to prove the allegations of the declaration by other evidence, he cannot recover. Nadenbousch v. Sharer, 2 W. Va. 285.

The relaxed rule would seem to have been that an answer is not inconsistent when the different facts stated in it may all be true. Jesus College v. Gibbs, 1 Younge & C. Exch. 160.

But that two pleas in the same action will not be permitted if one expressly admits what the other denies, unless they both appear necessary to the merits of the defense. Chapman v. Sloan, 2 N. H. 464.

Thus, in Ten Broeck v. Orchard, 79 N. C. 518, it was said that incompatible pleas were admissible under the former system of pleading, and a defendant could deny the plaintiff's claim and at the same time insist on its having been paid, or on the bar of the statute of limitations.

Inconsistent pleas should not be allowed, however, unless accompanied by an affidavit to show that they are necessary to the justice of the cause. Pleading Several Matters, 3 Bing. 635; Prinel v. Preston, Barnes's Notes, 351.

So, the whole subject of pleading several inconsistent pleas is left, under N. J. Rev. Stat. p. 867, § 118, which is substantially the same as the statute of Anne, in the discretion of the court to be controlled as the ends of substantial and speedy justice may require. And if the defenses pleaded are inconsistent the court may require an affidavit that they are necessary to the justness of the cause. Parks v. McClellan, 44 N. J. L. 552.

But a defendant will generally be allowed to plead in different pleas as many substantially different grounds of defense as may be thought necessary, though they appear to be contradictory and inconsistent, and the court will deny leave only where the several pleas are clearly repugnant, or will create unjust delay or embarrassment in obtaining a trial. Ibid.

So, in Pope v. Welsh, 18 Ala. 632, it was said that in an action for slander the pleas of not guilty and justification are inconsistent, but they may be and sometimes are pleaded together by leave of the court, under the statute of Anne; but the question in the case was as to the right to prove general bad character under the general issue.

V. The rule in equity.

The rule has been stated to be that in equity the defendant in a bill may set up any number of defenses in his answer, but the defenses must be consistent with each other. Scanlan v. Scanlan, 134 Ill. 630, 25 N. E. 652; Hopper v. Hopper, 11 Paige, 46, dictum.

And that pleas in equity may consist of a variety of facts and circumstances provided they are not inconsistent with each other, and all tend to one point, making out one connected

V. The rule in equity.

The rule has been stated to be that in equity the defendant in a bill may set up any number of defenses in his answer, but the defenses must be consistent with each other. Scanlan v. Scanlan, 134 Ill. 630, 25 N. E. 652; Hopper v. Hopper, 11 Paige, 46, dictum.

understanding of the cases cited and relied upon as sustaining the doctrine that inconsistent defenses, under the reformed practice of pleading, could be maintained; and, secondly, a loose discussion and misapprehension of what inconsistent pleadings really are. The idea that inconsistent defenses, to the extent of being false defenses, could be tolerated under the Code, has received a stimulus from the announcement of Mr. Pomeroy, in his excellent work on Remedies and Remedial Rights (§ 722), that, "assuming that the defenses are utterly inconsistent, the rule is established by an overwhelming weight of judicial authority that, unless expressly prohibited by the statute, they may still be united in one answer. It follows that the defendant cannot be compelled to elect between such defenses, nor can evidence in favor of either be excluded at the trial on the ground of the inconsistency." This announcement is attempted to be fortified by the citation of a large number of authorities. It was insisted by counsel for the respondent that an investigation of these authorities would show conclusively that they do not bear out the statement made by the author, and for the purpose of obtaining all the light possible on this question we have carefully examined the cases cited, and are forced to the conclusion that the learned author was unwarranted in making the assertion that the rule he announced was established by an overwhelming weight of judicial authority, or any weight of authority at all, under the Code practice. We think it legitimately follows, however, that if these inconsistent defenses are allowed to be pleaded, evidence under them cannot be excluded at the trial proposition sufficient of itself to form a defense to the bill, and not showing separate and distinct defenses, one of which would have been sufficient. Loud v. Sergeant, 1 Edw. Ch. 184.

And it has been held that if an averment in a plea is inconsistent with the matter pleaded the plea is bad. Emmott v. Mitchell, 14 Sim. 432, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 179, 9 Jur. 171.

But the prevailing and true rule is thought to be that the question whether or not defenses in equity may be set up together, depends upon whether or not they may all be true in fact.

Thus, a defendant in an action in equity may deny the allegations upon which the plaintiff's title to relief is founded, and at the same time set up in his answer any other matters not wholly inconsistent with such denial as a distinct or separate defense to the claim for relief made by the plea or some part thereof. Hopper v. Hopper, 11 Paige, 46.

As the different parts of his answer are not to be construed in the same manner as the different parts of a plea. Ibid.

But he cannot set up two distinct defenses therein which are so inconsistent with each other that if the matters constituting one defense are truly stated the matters upon which the other defense is admitted to be based, must necessarily be untrue in point of fact. Ibid.

And where an answer in chancery positively denies a fact charged in the bill, but proceeds to give a circumstantial account of the transaction, inconsistent with the truth of the denial, a single witness without corroborating circumstances is sufficient to prove the fact charged. Barraque v. Siter, 9 Ark. 545.

And where two papers are exhibited in an action in equity, and are admitted in the defendant's answer and declared by the court to be the agreement of the parties, they are sufficient to control another plea in the answer of the defendant denying the agreement without the aid of any oral testimony in their support. Jones v. Belt, 2 Gill, 106.

So, a denial in an answer in an action in equity of the existence of fraud will not avail to disprove it, where the answer admits facts from which fraud follows as a natural and legal, if not a necessary and unavoidable, conclusion. Hoboken Bank v. Beckman, 33 N. J. Eq. 53; Sayre v. Fredericks, 16 N. J. Eq. 205; Robinson v. Stewart, 10 N. Y. 189.

But where inconsistent defenses are set up in an answer to a bill in chancery, and such answer is not excepted to, and, on the hearing one of the defenses pleaded is found to be untrue, and the other is established by the proof, the decree will not be reversed on account of the interposition of such untrue and inconsistent defenses. Scanlan v. Scanlan, 134 Ill. 630, 25 N. E. 652.

And an allegation in an answer in an action to reform a deed, setting up the execution of a previous deed of the same property which had never been delivered, should not be stricken out as irrelevant, redundant, and constituting no defense, even under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2050, permitting a defendant to set forth in his answer as many consistent defenses as he may have. Crowder v. Searcy, 103 Mo. 97, 15 S. W. 346.

But an answer in an action brought by a city to perpetually restrain the defendants from encroaching upon premises alleged to have been dedicated to the public as a public square, and to procure the removal of buildings already placed thereon by the defendants, averring no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the rights of the plaintiff, but not distinctly denying the possession and ownership in the land, and admitting in another part that they have buildings fronting on the piece of ground claimed to be a public square, and insisting upon a right of access to such buildings and that the public square shall be kept open for their benefit, admits that they own the buildings and are in possession of them. Williams v. Smith, 22 Wis. 594.

And the defendant in a suit in equity by the beneficiary of a trust, to enforce the trust and subject the land described in the trust deeds to sale for the payment of moneys loaned on such security, who admits that the debt is still due and unpaid, cannot be permitted to allege that the indebtedness has been satisfied by a prior sale of the property to the complainant under a former suit to enforce the trust, and that the complainant is now estopped to demand a second sale of the property and at the same time aver that such prior sale was a nullity and was so decreed on a suit brought to set aside such sale, and that under such sale and annulment the complainant took nothing. Pepper v. Shepherd, 4 Mackey, 289.

And a denial in such an action to establish a lost will, in which it was alleged that the defendant had destroyed it, of all knowledge of the will, and an admission that she had stated that she had the will, but that she meant by such statement that she had certain verbal directions given by her father, the testator, concerning his property which she considered as his will, is inconsistent and absurd where the explanation is disproved by one witness; and the court may act on the admissions contained in on the ground of the inconsistency. Then, if they are inconsistent to the extent that, if one of the averments in the answer is true, the other must be false, and we follow the rule, as we must, that, if it is a proper subject of allegation, it is a proper subject of proof, a court of justice is placed in the absurd position of listening to proof of a defendant tending to sustain one proposition, and in the next breath proving another proposition, the facts of which are inconsistent with the one just testified to. This theory, carried to its logical result, would permit a defendant who was sued upon a promissory note to allege nonexecution, want of consideration, and payment. Under such allegations he would be permitted to swear that he never executed the note; that he did execute the note, but that it was without consideration; and that he did execute the note, that the consideration was good, but that he had paid the same. Such a practice as this would not only be farcical, but absolutely wrong and immoral, and an encouragement of perjury; and the example given is not extravagant, if the theory announced by the author be correct.

We take it that the only object of a lawsuit is the elicitation of truth, and that the only object of pleadings is to aid in determining the truth of the controversy. But the result of allowing pleadings to stand which are inconsistent, to the extent of being untrue, would have exactly the opposite tendency, and courts would simply become machines to aid unconscionable litigants in avoiding their just responsibilities. Under the common-law practice pleadings were based upon fictions, but the Code has undertaken to work a revolution in that respect, the answer, wholly disregarding the explanation. Brown v. Brown, 10 Yerg. 84.

A husband, however, in a suit by his wife against him for a separation on the ground of improper and cruel treatment, may deny the allegations upon which the complainant's title to relief is founded, and may at the same time set up any recriminatory matters not wholly inconsistent with such denials as distinct and separate defenses to the claim for relief, or to some part thereof. Hopper v. Hopper, 11 Paige, 48.

And a defendant in an action for divorce may deny the adultery charged in the bill, and also set up adultery on the part of the plaintiff, or any other matter in bar of the suit. Wood v. Wood, 2 Paige, 108.

And an allegation in an answer by a husband in an action by his wife for a separation, of improper intimacy on her part with a person with whom she knew her husband was not upon friendly terms, and other conduct calculated to irritate and provoke him, and acts of violence and unkind treatment, is not inconsistent with a denial that any acts of violence or of cruel treatment on his part had ever taken place. Hopper v. Hopper, 11 Paige, 48.

But allegations in an answer in an action for a judicial separation which admit of two interpretations, one to the effect that the defendant had abandoned the plaintiff, and that he was justified in abandoning her, and the other to the effect that he did not abandon her and did not intend to, but had left her with her consent, are bad and subject to exception. Fairchild v. Fairchild, 48 N. J. Eq. 473, 11 Atl. 426.

VI. The rule under reform procedure.

a. General statement of the doctrine.

Nearly if not all the codes of procedure of the different states contain provisions to the effect that a defendant in an action may plead as many defenses as he has, or as he deems necessary, and under these provisions it has been held generally by a great majority of the cases that separate pleas in an answer are not objectionable because of repugnancy or inconsistency with each other. Ansley v. Bank of Piedmont, 113 Ala. 467, 21 So. 59; Lincoln v. Wiliamowics, 7 Ark. 378; McIlroy v. Buckner, 35 Ark. 555; Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671; Miles v. Woodward, 115 Cal. 308, 40 Pac. 1076, 47 Pac. 860; Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935; People ex rel. Crawford v. Lothrop, 8 Colo. 428; Tucker 48 L. R. A.

v. Edwards, 7 Colo. 209, 3 Pac. 233; Koll v. Bush, 6 Colo. App. 294, 40 Pac. 579; Union Bank v. Ridgely, 1 Harr. & G. 324; Farnan v. Childs, 66 Ill. 547; Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Barton, 38 Ill. App. 469; Holmes v. Tarble, 77 Ill. App. 114; Morgan v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 37 Iowa, 359; Horton v. Banner, 6 Bush, 599; Gordian v. Peirce, 11 Ma. 213; Rowland v. Dalton, 36 Miss. 702; Lay v. Filmore, 75 Miss. 493, 23 So. 184; Adams v. Trigg, 37 Mo. 141; Cate v. Hutchinson, 58 Neb. 282, 78 N. W. 500; Parks v. McClellan, 44 N. J. L. 552; Woods v. Reiss, 78 Hun, 80, 29 N. Y. Supp. 263; Sheldon v. Heaton, 78 Hun, 50, 29 N. Y. Supp. 275; MacColl v. American Union L. Ins. Co. 89 Hun, 490, 35 N. Y. Supp. 384; Ostrom v. Bixby, 9 How. Pr. 57; Smith v. Wells, 20 How. Pr. 158; Siriani v. Deutsch, 12 Misc. 213, 34 N. Y. Supp. 26; Bruce v. Burr, 67 N. Y. 287; Goodwin v. Wertheimer, 90 N. Y. 149, 1 N. E. 404; Societa Italiana Di Beneficenza v. Sulzer, 138 N. Y. 465, 34 N. E. 193; Ross v. Duffy, 12 N. Y. S. R. 584; Bryant v. Bryant, 2 Robt. 612; Ten Broeck v. Orchard, 79 N. C. 518; McLamb v. McPhail (N. C.) 35 S. E. 426; Reed v. Reed, 93 N. C. 462; McDonald v. American Mortg. Co. 17 Or. 626, 21 Pac. 883; Millan v. Southern R. Co. 54 S. C. 485, 32 S. E. 539; Stebbins v. Lardner, 2 S. Dak. 127, 48 N. W. 847; Lawrence v. Peck, 8 S. Dak. 645, 54 N. W. 808; Green v. Hughtitt School Twp. 5 S. Dak. 452, 59 N. W. 224; Shelby County v. Bickford, 102 Tenn. 895, 52 S. W. 772; Hillebrant v. Booth, 7 Tex. 499; Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 626; Smith v. Sublett, 28 Tex. 103; Burnham v. Call, 2 Utah, 433; Hummel v. Moore, 25 Fed. Rep. 380; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Warren, 3 Wyo. 134, 6 Pac. 724; Furniss v. Ellis, 2 Brock. 14, Fed. Cas. No. 5,162; Anonymous, 1 Code Rep. 134; Porter v. McCreedy, Code Rep. N. S. 88.

And the rule is the same under provision that a defendant may set forth by answer or cross complaint as many defenses or counterclaims or set-offs as he may have, whether the subject-matter of such defenses be such as were heretofore denominated legal or equitable or both. People ex rel. Crawford v. Lothrop, 8 Colo. 428; Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935; Miles v. Woodward, 115 Cal. 308, 40 Pac. 1076, 47 Pac. 860; Societa Italiana Di Beneficenza v. Sulzer, 138 N. Y. 465, 34 N. E. 193; Ross v. Duffy, 12 N. Y. S. R. 584; Ten Broeck v. Orchard, 79 N. C. 518; McDonald v. American Mortg. Co. 17 Or. 626, 21 Pac. 883; Stebbins v. Lardner, 2 S. Dak. 127, 48 N. W. 847.

And this rule is not affected by the fact that and under its provisions it is the evident intention that the pleadings shall be based upon facts which are susceptible of proof. Our Code provides that the complaint shall contain a plain and concise statement of facts constituting a cause of action, and while it does not, in so many words, provide that the answer shall contain a statement of facts, it does so, in substance, so far as any affirmative allegations are concerned; for the language of the Code is that it shall contain a statement of any new matter, constituting a defense or counterclaim, in ordinary and concise language. It is true that it further provides that the defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have, whether they be such as have been heretofore denominated legal, or equitable, or both. This is all the authority there is for claiming that, under the Code, the defendant is allowed to plead inconsistent defenses. It is true that he may set forth as many defenses as he has, but it could not have been the intention of the Code that he should set forth anything that was not true; for, if it was not true, it would not be a defense. There certainly could have been no intention to have discriminated against the plaintiff by giving advantage to the defendant, so far as the pleadings are concerned. It is just as consistent to insist that the plaintiff may state in his complaint inconsistent causes of action, or facts constituting his cause of action which are inconsistent with each other, as to insist that the defendant may do so in his answer. The evident intention of the Code was to place them upon an equal footing,—to compel the plaintiff by his complaint, through the medium of a statement the answer was verified. Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935.

And it does not follow because he has set up one defense which is good upon its face that he shall not be permitted to set up another. McDonald v. American Mortg. Co. 17 Or. 626, 21 Pac. 883.

And a plea of the general issue is not waived by special pleas claimed to be puia darrein continuance. Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Barton, 38 Ill. App. 469.

In Stebbins v. Lardner, 2 S. Dak. 127, 48 N. W. 847, supra, the rule adopted by a number of the other states, including Missouri, was explained and distinguished upon the ground that that rule is based upon a statute providing that different consistent defenses may be stated in the same answer, and it was said that hence cases decided under such statutes are not an authority in the case at bar.

The only restriction as to the manner of stating such defenses is that requiring that each shall be separately stated. Buddington v. Davis, 6 How. Pr. 401; Anonymous, 1 Code Rep. 134; Morgan v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 37 Iowa, 359; McLamb v. McPhail (N. C.) 85 S. E. 426.

And they must be set out in separate counts or defenses of the answer, each of which must be sufficient in itself to present the defense intended to be pleaded. Morgan v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 37 Iowa, 359; Farnan v. Childs, 66 Ill. 547; Millan v. Southern R. Co. 54 S. C. 485, 32 S. E. 539; Hummel v. Moore, 25 Fed. Rep. 380.

But the statute does not dispense with the necessity of allegations of facts which constitute each ground of defense by consistent averments. Hillebrant v. Booth, 7 Tex. 499; Bryant v. Bryant, 2 Robt. 612; Smith v. Wells, 20 Ilow. Pr. 158.

The answer may embrace a general denial and a plea in confession and avoidance, and so far may embrace inconsistent defenses; but each plea in confession and avoidance must constitute in itself a good defense, and must be consistent in its averments. Hillebrant v. Booth, 7 Tex. 499.

Thus, an answer in an action for the violation of a statute containing two separate and distinct defenses, by one of which the defendant denied a violation of the statute and by the other averred matters of extenuation, excuse, and defense, is not subject to objection for inconsistency. Miles v. Woodward, 115 Cal. 308, 46 Pac. 1076, 47 Pac. 360.

Where the statute with reference to pleading several pleas in an answer makes no distinction with reference to the subject of inconsistency, the right given is not to be limited by construction to strictly consistent pleas, but the privilege is to be given to the defendant of succeeding, not only on the strength of his own case, but on the weakness also of the plaintiff's case, by permitting apparently incompatible pleas to be pleaded, as not guilty and accord and satisfaction, or not guilty and non assensu demenciae, or not guilty or non assensu and the statute of limitations, or non est factum and payment, or non est factum and general performance, etc. Union Bank v. Ridgely, 1 Harr. & G. 324.

And a judgment in an action in which such pleas are interposed will not be held erroneous on the ground that the verdict was not responsive to all the issues. Holmes v. Tarble, 77 Ill. App. 114.

Oregon Code, § 157, providing that the defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses as he may have separately stated, is similar to IV. Anne, chap. 16, § 4, allowing double pleas, and should be similarly construed, so as to permit a defendant to plead inconsistent and contradictory defenses in the same answer, provided they be separately stated. Hall v. Austin, Deady, 104, Fed. Cas. No. 5,925.

There is no provision in the statute which allows answers to be struck out on the specific ground of inconsistency unless one of the allegations is necessarily false. Ostrom v. Bixby, 9 How. Pr. 57; Snodgrass v. Andross, 19 Or. 236, 23 Pac. 969.

Inconsistent pleas may be made and relied on when not forbidden by statute. Rooney v. Tierney, 82 Ky. 253.

And under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 352, § 9, leave of the court is not necessary to the defendant to plead as many defenses as he may think necessary for his defense. Auburn & O. Canal Co. v. Leitch, 4 Denio, 65.

And a defendant may plead two or more pleas, some of which may terminate in issues of fact to be tried by a jury, while others may result in issues of law to be determined by the court. Ibid.

The rights of the defendant are absolute, and cannot be limited or restricted by the court because two or more of the pleas inserted are inconsistent with each other. Lincoln v. Willamowicz, 7 Ark. 378.

The court is given no such controlling power over the pleas interposed by a defendant when they are separately stated. Ibid. dictum; Furniss v. Ellis, 2 Brock. 14, Fed. Cas. No. 5,162; Snodgrass v. Andross, 19 Or. 236, 23 Pac. 969.

of facts, to inform the defendant what the true cause of action or complaint was; and it was just as much the intention of the framers of the Code to compel the defendant, if he had an affirmative defense, to inform the plaintiff by his answer what that affirmative defense was. There can be no reason or right in any other theory. The object of the Code was to simplify lawsuits. Whether it has succeeded in doing so may be questioned, but certainly it must be consistent with itself; and it would bring about untold confusion and bad results to undertake to ingraft into the Code practice practices which were admissible under, and probably harmonized with, the theory of the common-law practice. The two are incongruous, and must be kept separate and distinct, and therefore the commingling of the two evolves a system which is worse than either.

But when the pleas are not so offered the English doctrine applies, and the right rests in the discretion of the court. Furniss v. Ellis, 2 Brock. 14, Fed. Cas. No. 5,162.

So, under such an act, while a denial is not technically an affirmative defense, it may be interposed with affirmative defenses, and to strike it out because inconsistent with the affirmative defense interposed is error. Woods v. Reiss, 78 Hun, 80, 29 N. Y. Supp. 263.

And under the Texas statute providing that the defendant in his answer may plead as many several matters, whether of law or fact, as he shall think necessary for his defense, and which may be pertinent to the cause, provided he shall file them all at the same time and in due order of pleading, the right given to plead several matters is unlimited if they are pertinent, filed at the same time and in due order of pleading, and there is no qualification or abridgment of the right in matters that are inconsistent. Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 626.

And an intervenor occupying the attitude of a defendant, and resisting a claim to his property asserted by the plaintiff, is entitled to the same latitude, and his pleas cannot be objected to as inconsistent and contradictory. Smith v. Sublett, 28 Tex. 163.

But while a defendant may set up as many defenses as he may have, whether inconsistent or not, an order at the opening of a trial requiring defendant's counsel to elect whether he would rely upon the defense set up in the answer as a defense merely or as a counterclaim on the ground that they were inconsistent, if erroneous, is not ground for reversal, where no valid counterclaim was pleaded, and hence the defendant lost nothing by being required in effect to abandon an insufficient pleading. Societa Italiana Di Beneficenza v. Sulzer, 138 N. Y. 468, 34 N. E. 193.

In some of the states, however, the right of a defendant to set up several defenses in an answer is limited, either by the language of the statute or by the construction given to it by the courts, to defenses which are not inconsistent. Among these states are Missouri, Kansas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Louisiana.

Thus, under the Minnesota system of pleading a defendant may set up as many defenses as he may have, the only limit to the right being that they must not be inconsistent. Steenerson v. Waterbury, 52 Minn. 211, 53 N. W. 1146; Booth v. Sherwood, 12 Minn. 426.

And under the Missouri statute an answer may contain as many causes of action as the defendant may have, but they must be consistent defenses and separately stated. Darrett v. 48 L. R. A.

But, notwithstanding the inconsistency of the courts in announcing the doctrine of inconsistent defenses, the authorities cited by Mr. Pomeroy in the text above referred to, while they use the expression, in some instances, that under the Code inconsistent defenses may be allowed, yet evidently do not mean that the defendant is allowed to plead a false defense,—a defense which is utterly inconsistent with the other defenses pleaded. Thus, one of the cases cited in the note of the author, viz., Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671, announces that several defenses inconsistent with each other may, under proper circumstances, be set up in a verified answer. In that case, in an action to recover a mining claim, the complaint alleged title and possession in plaintiffs on a certain day. The answer denied that plaintiffs ever had either title or possession, and afterwards averred

Donnelly, 38 Mo. 404; Smith v. Culligan, 74 Mo. 389; Adams v. Trigg, 37 Mo. 141.

It is a principle of pleading, under the Missouri Code, that the defendant cannot deny and at the same time confess and avoid the allegations in the petition. McCord v. Doniphan Branch R. Co. 21 Mo. App. 92; Adams v. Trigg, 37 Mo. 141.

So, under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 2657, a defendant may plead as many defenses and counterclaims as he has, although they may be based on inconsistent legal theories. South Milwaukee Boulevard Heights Co. v. Harte, 95 Wis. 592, 70 N. W. 821.

But, the statutory rule that a defendant may plead as many defenses and counterclaims as he has, though based on inconsistent legal theories, does not affect the general principle that the truth should be pleaded. Ibid.

And the rule which prevails in Louisiana on the subject of general and special pleas is that they may be presented together if consistent with each other. Inconsistent or contradictory pleas alone are forbidden. Andrews v. Hensler, 6 Wall. 254, 18 L. ed. 737.

And while independently of the general issue a defendant may set up other means of defense to use in case the general denial fails him, such special pleas must be consistent with the general one, and not contradictory to it. Nagel v. Mignot, 8 Mart. (La.) 493.

And a plea of the general issue in an action for the price of merchandise sold and a plea of payment cannot be united in the same answer. Dean v. Jackson, 1 Mart. N. S. 127.

But, a plea of prescription in an action for a money demand is not inconsistent with an admission that the debt was once due, or with a plea of payment and compensation. Colley v. Latourette, 7 La. Ann. 222.

It will be found, however, that this apparent conflict is not real, or at least is real to but a slight extent. The courts holding that different defenses in an answer must not be inconsistent have defined inconsistency within the meaning of that rule, as will be seen by reference to decisions of the same courts set forth infra, VI. b, and VI. c, in the same terms, and as being the same thing as inconsistency in fact as defined by the other courts, and held by them to be improper and objectionable. And it will also be seen that though the cases first above set forth lay down the rule absolutely that inconsistent defenses may be pleaded, the rule must be taken as referring to the facts of the particular cases in which it was so stated, as the inconsistency which is not objectionable under either class of that if plaintiffs ever had a title to the claim, they had abandoned and forfeited it before defendants' entry. The question of title and possession might have been very largely a question of law, which it would have been unsafe for the defendants to have admitted. But that is altogether a different proposition from the one under consideration, where there is an affirmative allegation in the answer, which, if true, sustains an allegation of the complaint,—a fact alleged, the proof of which is material to the support of the plaintiff's cause of action. In this case there are no hypothetical facts pleaded; but the answer plainly avers that the notes were transferred, that the appellant dealt with the respondent as the owner and holder of them, and that, as such owner and holder, he made settlement for said notes. The most that could be said of such a pleading as this, where in one breath the pleader denies a fact and in the next admits it, is that the denial and admission balance each other, and leave the complaint in the position it would be in if no denials or admissions had been made. But in this instance the case is stronger against the defendant, for he denies by general denial and avers by special averment the truth of the thing which he denied. Buhne v. Corbett, 43 Cal. 264, was an action of ejectment, where the plaintiff demanded the premises, and averred that at a certain date the possession was unlawfully withheld from him by the defendants. The defendants, in their answer, denied that on said day, or at any other time, they entered into the possession of the premises, or that they then withheld the possession of the same. And they affirmatively made the showing that the lands cases is inconsistency by implication of law as distinguished from inconsistency in fact. See infra, VI. b, and VI. c.

b. What defenses are inconsistent.

1. Distinction between inconsistency in fact and inconsistency by implication of law.

The inconsistent defenses which may be set up in an answer under statutory provisions, providing that the defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have, are those in which the inconsistency arises by implication of law, and which are in the nature of pleas of confession and avoidance as contradistinguished from denials, and not such as involve a direct contradiction of any fact elsewhere directly averred. Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671.

It is only where the inconsistency between pleas in an answer complained of is one of fact in favor of the defendant, which could not stand in connection with a fact pleaded in favor of the plaintiff, or where the inconsistency is between two facts contradictory to each other, or which neutralize each other with reference to the same plea, so that the verdict thereon would be a nullity, that such pleas cannot be united. Kelly v. Craig, 9 Humph. 215.

Defenses are inconsistent only when one in fact contradicts the other, and are not so in law where the inconsistency is merely a seemingly logical one arising from a denial and a plea in confession and avoidance. Cohn v. Lehman, 93 Mo. 574, 6 S. W. 267.

Facts set forth in an answer, which controvert the allegations of the complaint in effect only, may be properly pleaded in connection with a direct denial of the main allegations thereof, and they may be so pleaded by way of confession and avoidance of the cause of action alleged in the complaint, though the denial be such that if true it would defeat the cause of action; but the denial should be special and qualified. McDonald v. American Mortg. Co. 17 Or. 626, 21 Pac. 883.

A denial of the plaintiff's cause of action, and a defense by way of confession and avoidance, may be pleaded together, where the plea by way of confession and avoidance admits the plaintiff's cause of action only by implication of law, as a mere technical supposition on which the defense proceeds, and not as an admission in fact. Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600.

Two defenses are not so inconsistent as not to be pleaded together unless there is an absolute incompatibility of the facts. Nelson v. Brodhack, 44 Mo. 596, 100 Am. Dec. 328.

The only limitation upon the right of a defendant to defend himself against the action of the plaintiff on as many different grounds as the nature of the action and the merits of his defense will allow is that they shall not involve the ridiculous absurdity of being inconsistent in fact. Richardson v. Whitfield, 2 McCord, L. 148.

And a defense of set-off, counterclaim, discharge in insolvency or bankruptcy, or the statute of limitations, and the like, conflicts with a general denial by implication of law only, and the pleader should not be required to elect between such a defense and a general denial, or refused permission to support such affirmative defense by proof. Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671.

So, a defendant may plead under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2050, as many defenses as he may have, whether legal or equitable or both, the only limit being that they must be consistent, the consistency required being one of fact merely. Crowder v. Searcy, 103 Mo. 97, 15 S. W. 346; Nelson v. Brodhack, 44 Mo. 596, 100 Am. Dec. 328.

Pleas which were not inconsistent under the practice of the courts previous to the New York Code will not be held inconsistent as answers under the Code. Lansing v. Parker, 9 How. Pr. 288.

And in pleading defenses under it a defendant should not be required to elect between a denial of a material allegation in the complaint authorized by New York Code, § 149, subd. 1, and another matter constituting a defense under subd. 2 of that section. Hollenbeck v. Clow, 9 How. Pr. 289.

So, under the provisions of the South Carolina Code, a defendant may in his answer set forth as many defenses as were allowable under the former practice. Cohrs v. Fraser, 5 S. C. N. S. 351.

2. Test as to what inconsistency is objectionable.

The test of inconsistency of defenses which renders their union objectionable under the Codes of Procedure of the several states, like that in equity as well as under the more relaxed rules under the statute of Anne, is generally the question whether both may be true, or whether if one be true the other must be false, and proof of one would necessarily disprove the other. Gammon v. Ganfield, 42 Minn. 368, 44 N. W. 125; Backdahl v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 46 Minn. 61, 48 N. W. 454; Steenerson v. Water- belonged to the United States; that the United States had continually occupied and possessed said lands, from a date long prior to the date of the alleged withholding by the defendants, for lighthouse purposes; that it had erected and maintained a lighthouse thereon; that the defendants were the keepers of the lighthouse and employed by the United States at stipulated wages, and that as such keepers they were mere servants and employees of the United States, subject at any and all times to the orders, directions, and commands of the United States; that as such servants they were in the temporary charge of the light and lighthouse buildings on said land for the sole purpose of keeping the light burning at proper times. Averred that they did not at that time, and never had, claimed any interest in said lands or improvements, or any part thereof, but that, since its reservation for a lighthouse, the land had been in the sole possession of the United States through its employees. And this case was based upon the doctrine announced in Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671. So that it will be seen at a glance that, while the court announces in words the rule that inconsistent answers may be pleaded, these answers were really not inconsistent; that the sole object was to raise the issue that the possession alleged by the complaint was the possession of the United States, and not the possession of the plaintiff in the action. The next case cited, that of Wilson v. Cleveland, 30 Cal. 192, is a still weaker case, and cites in its support, also, the case of Bell v. Brown. All that was decided in that case was that a defendant may deny the title of the plaintiff, and also plead the statute of limitations.

Warren, 3 Wyo. 134, 6 Pac. 724.

This is the rule of the principal case.

The court has no power, under the Codes, to require defendants to elect upon which of their defenses they will rely, where more than one is set forth by the answer, and evidence is given tending to prove their truth, unless they are so far inconsistent that both cannot properly co-exist in the same transaction. Kelly v. Bernheimer, 3 Thomp. & C. 140.

And a defendant may plead inconsistent defenses under the Code system of pleading provided they are not so incompatible as to render one or the other absolutely false, and in so pleading he does not waive any of the defenses set up by him. Clarke v. Lyon County, 7 Nev. 75.

And defenses are not inconsistent where the facts pleaded in both may be true, merely because proof of one may render proof of the other unnecessary. Backdahl v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 46 Minn. 61, 48 N. W. 454; Gammon v. Ganfield, 42 Minn. 368, 44 N. W. 125.

Repugnancy in an answer is ordinarily not a ground for demurrer when the second allegation is merely superfluous and redundant, and in that case the latter may be stricken out or disregarded, and will not vitiate the pleading; but it is otherwise where the pleading is so inconsistent with itself as to destroy the meaning. Second Nat. Bank v. Hart, 8 Ind. App. 19, 35 N. E. 302.

And under Code provisions that the defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have, a special defense of new matter in avoidance may go with a traverse.

verse, at least when not inconsistent, though the new matter logically admits by implication real or apparent right in the plaintiff, sought to be thus avoided. Veasey v. Humphreys, 27 Or. 515, 41 Pac. 8.

A positive denial of the allegations of the complaint, and an allegation of new matter as a defense thereto in the nature of confession and avoidance, are not necessarily inconsistent with each other where it is possible for both to be true. Snodgrass v. Andross, 19 Or. 236, 23 Pac. 969.

And traverses and answers in avoidance may go together when not inconsistent. Cohn v. Lehman, 98 Mo. 574, 6 S. W. 267; Ledbetter v. Ledbetter, 88 Mo. 62.

And a plea of estoppel may be joined with one amounting to a traverse, where the two are not in their nature inconsistent. Blodgett v. McMurtry, 39 Neb. 210, 57 N. W. 985.

In the above case Whittemore v. Stephens, 48 Mich. 574, 12 N. W. 858, supra, IV. a, was distinguished upon the ground that that was a suit upon a promissory note under the common-law practice, in which the general issue was pleaded, and then there was a plea of pais darrein continuance averring a composition under the bankrupt act. In that case the plea was in effect one in confession and avoidance, and was therefore entirely inconsistent with the general issue.

And non est factum, usury, infancy, duress, and payment may be pleaded together under the Maine system of pleading. Granite State Bank v. Otis, 53 Me. 133, dictum.

The right to plead double, when given in civil cases by statute, does not require the permission of the court, and therefore a man may plead payment and non est factum together. Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188, dictum.

And a plea of non est factum as to the instrument sued on, and a plea of payment of another but a different instrument which only appears in the suit by pleading and evidence tending to show why the defendant is not liable in the suit, and a plea of the statute of limitations, are not inconsistent with each other. May v. Burk, 80 Mo. 675.

In the above case, Sheppard v. Starrett, 85 Mo. 867, VI. c. 2, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the defenses were non est factum and payment, which were held to be inconsistent.

So, the defendant in an action has the right to plead under the laws of Virginia as many several matters, whether of law or of fact, as he may deem necessary for his defense, and he

It would seem that comment on this case was unnecessary. One is the pleading of a legal defense, and the other a defense on the merits; and the court in that case specially says that the defenses are not inconsistent.

It may profitably be noted here that a great majority of the cases which have announced the doctrine that inconsistent defenses may be pleaded cite, in support of the announcement, Hollenbeck v. Clow, 9 How. Pr. 289, which announces the rule that, in pleading defenses under the Code, the defendant shall not be required to elect between a denial of the material allegations in the complaint and new matter constituting a defense; that is, that the defendant should never be required to admit allegations in the complaint, which he might otherwise be able to deny, as the condition upon which he is permitted to set up affirmative matters of defense. This was an action for slander, where the charge, as stated in the complaint, was that the defendant stated that plaintiff had stolen the defendant's hay. There was a general denial by the defendant, and then the answer proceeded as follows: "And the said defendant, further answering, says that all the words which were spoken or uttered by the defendant of, to, or concerning the said plaintiff, as set forth in the complaint, charging him, said plaintiff, with stealing or taking hay, or that the plaintiff had stolen the defendant's hay, were spoken and uttered by the defendant in reference to a quantity of hay which the defendant had cut and stacked in the summer of 1853, and to which hay the plaintiff claimed title, and which hay the plaintiff, under such claim of title, in the daytime, took and removed may plead nil debet to the count of the declaration on which issue is joined, and the statute of limitations to the same count, without rendering the pleading objectionable for inconsistency. Bank of United States v. Donnelly, 8 Pet. 361, 8 L. ed. 974.

And a plea of the statute of limitations, and another that the judgment sued on was rendered without process conferring jurisdiction, and was void, are not inconsistent as the plea of the statute of limitations to avoid the cause of action need not in fact confess it. Merten v. San Angelo Nat. Bank, 5 Okla. 585, 49 Pac. 918.

And a plea of the statute of limitations to all the causes of action alleged in the complaint is not inconsistent with another plea averring that the plaintiff and defendant had a full and complete accounting, and that the defendant made and delivered, and the plaintiff accepted, a wagon in full settlement and satisfaction of the amount found due on the accounting, so as to require an election upon the counts. Conway v. Wharton, 13 Minn. 158, Gll. 145.

And a plea in an answer in an action brought by an administrator as such, denying any right in the plaintiff in his capacity as administrator to the subject of controversy, is not inconsistent with another plea alleging the release of the defendant from liability on the instrument in suit, by failure of its consideration, as both averments may be true. Noonan v. Bradley, 3 Wall. 394, 19 L. ed. 757.

An answer by way of confession and avoidance of the matter alleged in a complaint, however, is inconsistent with a specific denial thereof, but may properly be pleaded with a special or qualified denial. McDonald v. American Mortg. Co. 17 Or. 626, 21 Pac. 883.

All that is contemplated by Iowa Code, § 2710, is that defenses cannot be objected to simply because they are inconsistent with each other. It does not apply to a case in which the assertion of one of the rights pleaded destroys the other. Crawford v. Nolan, 70 Iowa, 97, 80 N. W. 82.

And while different defenses may be pleaded in the same answer under the Code, contradictory or inconsistent pleas cannot, and the defendant cannot deny and confess a fact in the same pleading,—especially where the pleading is verified and the fact both denied and confessed is a matter within his own personal knowledge. Ormsby v. Douglass, 2 Abb. Pr. 407.

And a plea of tender admits the indebtedness for which the tender was made, and a general denial and tender are inconsistent defenses which cannot be pleaded to the same cause of action. Livingston v. Harrison, 2 E. D. Smith, 197.

So, a plea of usury involves a denial that anything is due from the defendant to the plaintiff, and a plea of tender implies that there is an indebtedness to the amount tendered, and the two are inconsistent and cannot stand together. Breunich v. Weselman, 100 N. Y. 609, 2 N. E. 885.

This test has been based upon the theory that under the Code system pleadings are required to be verified by oath, and that if the inconsistency were one of fact the verification of the one defense would be a falsification of the other, and therefore a forgery.

Thus, the right of the defendant under the Code to plead any number of defenses in the same answer is limited only by the necessity of their being verified by oath, and all may be joined therefore which can be verified by oath without swearing falsely. Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600; Citizens' Bank v. Closson, 29 Ohio St. 78; Cate v. Hutchinson, 58 Neb. 232, 78 N. W. 500.

The defendant may plead as many defenses as he may have, if, when the answer is sworn to, it is not contradictory. Burnham v. Call, 2 Utah, 483.

But if a fact which is directly averred in one part of a verified answer is in another part directly denied, the party verifying is guilty of perjury, and on the trial the averment which bears most strongly against him will be taken to be true. Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671.

Where two alleged grounds of defense plainly contradict each other, they are not susceptible of verification because it is impossible for both to be true, and the verification of one would be the falsification of the other; and in such case the answer, though sworn to, will be regarded as not verified within the provisions of the Ohio Code, requiring pleadings to be verified by oath, and should, on motion, be stricken from the files, or the defendant be put to his election. Citizens' Bank v. Closson, 29 Ohio St. 78.

So, under the Nebraska Code, authorizing the defendant to set up as many defenses as he may have, they must be consistent in fact, and as they must be sworn to the defendant must believe them to be true. School Dist. No. 27 v. Holmes, 16 Neb. 466, 20 N. W. 721.

What were consistent or inconsistent pleas under the old practice, where the pleadings were not required to be verified, is a very different question from what are consistent or inconsistent answers under the present Missouri upon lands adjoining to and in sight of where it had been left by the defendant, which trespass or transaction, and not the crime of larceny, was all that the defendant intended by the speaking of said words, and was so understood by and explained to all who heard the defendant utter the words." We have set this answer out at length because it conclusively shows that the defenses pleaded in this case were not inconsistent, but that the averment, after the general denial, was simply a pleading of the facts, the legal effect of which would be to sustain the general denial, and would in no sense be an untrue averment, conceding the truth of the general denial; and it will be seen that they are in no sense inconsistent, although the court, in announcing its decision, speaks of them as inconsistent defenses. But the cases cited and reviewed by that court conclusively show that, in the judgment of the court, the defenses were not actually inconsistent, and certainly did not attempt to lay down the rule that inconsistent defenses could be pleaded to the extent of pleading untruthful defenses; for, in commenting on the case of Arnold v. Dimon, 4 Sandf. 680, cited by Justice Crippen in Roe v. Rodgers, 8 How. Pr. 350, where the action was against a carrier for the loss of goods, and defendant denied that he was the owner of the vessel upon which the goods were shipped, and then averred that the goods had in fact been delivered to the plaintiff, the court said: "It is quite possible, to say the least, that both these defenses might have been true. They were therefore not wholly inconsistent, and should have been allowed to stand." So that it will be seen that this case is no basis at all for the an-practice, where the pleadings are required to be sworn to. Atteberry v. Powell, 29 Mo. 429, 77 Am. Dec. 579, dictum.

Where new matter directly alleged would be inconsistent with an absolute traverse, so that both could not be verified, and the pleader desires to avail himself of both defenses so as to put the opposing party to the proof of his plea, and at the same time save to himself an affirmative defense, it is essential that the allegations of new matter should be qualified, or else that they should be superseded by a qualified traverse; but this applies only where the defenses are really, and not merely apparently, inconsistent. Vessey v. Humphreys, 27 Or. 515, 41 Pac. 8. See also McIntire v. Wiegand, 24 Abb. N. C. 312, 10 N. Y. Supp. 3.

But while all pleadings are not required to be verified under all the Codes, the rule would seem to be universal, applying alike to verified and unverified pleadings.

Thus, the statutory provision that a defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he may have, applies alike to all answers, verified and unverified. Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671.

There is no distinction, in respect to the effect of inconsistency between defenses, between pleadings verified and pleadings unverified. Buhne v. Corbett, 48 Cal. 264.

c. Application of the rule to particular actions.

While the above test as to inconsistency which will prevent the union of defenses has not always been expressly applied in all particular classes of actions in which inconsistencies have been alleged, and the distinction between inconsistency in fact and inconsistency in law has not always been expressly adverted to, it is thought that that test will nearly, if not quite, reconcile the apparent differences between the cases set forth in the following subdivisions with reference to particular actions, and that that distinction will be found running through nearly if not all of them.

1. Actions pertaining to contracts generally.

A defendant in an action on contract, who does not claim any right as against the plaintiff under the contract sued on, may set up both its illegality and its performance without inconsistency, though it would be otherwise if the establishment of the contract were an essential element of the defense. Lee v. Dodd, 20 Mo. App. 271.

And a denial under oath that the defendant executed the written contract sued on, and an allegation that the other contracting party did not build the railroad as therein specified, are not so inconsistent that they cannot stand together. Cox v. Bishop, 55 Mo. App. 135.

And a plea by a defendant that he did not undertake, agree, or covenant as alleged in the complaint, and also that he does not owe the plaintiff anything on the deed or covenants or on account of any matters or things whatever alleged in the complaint, are separate pleas making a separate and distinct defense, which are not waived by anything set up or conceded by the legal effect of the pleading or in any other separate or distinct plea. Shelby County v. Bickford, 102 Tenn. 305, 52 S. W. 772.

And a defendant is not estopped by pleading his rights under a contract from claiming the advantage of any change in the contract which legitimate proof may develop. Weiden v. Texas Continental Meat Co. 65 Tex. 487.

So, pleas in an action of assumpsit of the general issue, payment and release, want of consideration, denial of interest in the instrument sued on in the plaintiff, and set-off may be pleaded together, under Miss. Code 1892, § 483, and should not be stricken out as inconsistent and contradictory. Lay v. Filmore, 75 Miss. 493, 23 So. 184.

And a defendant who has stated in his answer all the facts necessary to constitute a defense of want of consideration or for a recoupment of damages need not state which defense he will insist upon, and if he does so state, he is not precluded from insisting upon any defense which the facts alleged would justify. Springer v. Dwyer, 50 N. Y. 19.

And a counterclaim, the object of which is to obtain damages for breach of contract should it be held that it was binding and that there was no fraud, is not inconsistent with, and may be joined in the same answer with, a defense or counterclaim to avoid the contract on the ground of fraud. South Milwaukee Boulevard Heights Co. v. Harte, 95 Wis. 592, 70 N. W. 821.

But while inconsistent defenses are allowed to be pleaded under the New York Code, the courts will not go so far as to permit a defendant to plead, first, that he never executed the instrument sued upon, and, second, that he did execute it but by means of fraud; as no one could safely swear to such a plea. McIntire v. Wiegand, 24 Abb. N. C. 312, 10 N. Y. Supp. 3.

And a plea of want of consideration for the contract sued on is inconsistent with an admis-nouncement of the rule that defenses which are utterly inconsistent may be pleaded. Butler v. Wentworth, 9 How. Pr. 282, was also a case of slander, where the defendant answered, saying: "I have no recollection or belief of having so accused you; but, secondly, if I did, the charge was true." As a matter of course, if the defendant had no recollection of having used the slanderous words, he had a right to put the plaintiff upon his proof upon that question. He might not have known as a matter of fact whether he did use them or not. He may have used them, and forgotten them. And if it should eventuate in the trial that he did use them, then certainly he should not be deprived of his defenses of the truth of the words uttered. It cannot be said that, in any sense, these defenses are inconsistent. Vail v. Jones, 31 Ind. 467, announces the doctrine that under the Code, the defendant may set forth in his answer as many grounds of defense as he may have, without regard to the location of the subject-matter, which was simply the language of the statute; but the case itself decides nothing that tends to sustain the doctrine claimed by the appellant. Weston v. Lumley, 33 Ind. 486, was a slander case, and the court there simply reiterated the doctrine announced in the other cases of that kind which we have reviewed, although what was said by the court, even in this case, was simply dictum, for it decided that the question could not be raised upon demurrer as it was attempted to be raised there. The case of Moore v. Willamette Transp. & Lumber Co. 7 Or. 355, was where the answer alleged that the defendant was the owner of the entire estate, and also pleaded that he was the owner of one un-tion in an affirmative defense that there was a consideration; and in such case the plaintiff is not required to prove the matter denied. Allen v. Olympia Light & P. Co. 13 Wash. 807, 43 Pac. 55.

So, a defense in an action upon contract that the contract had been revoked and another defense that it had been modified, are inconsistent, as it could not be revoked and at the same time modified, and the defendant setting it up should be compelled to elect upon which he will stand. Cook v. Finch, 19 Minn. 407, Gil. 850.

And a defense in an answer consisting of a denial of the making of the contract set forth in the complaint, and another consisting of an allegation that the defendants were induced to make the contract by the false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiffs, is inconsistent, and the general denial should be stricken out. Marx v. Gross, 9 N. Y. Supp. 719, 26 Jones & S. 221.

And an answer in an action on a bond pleading, by way of confession and avoidance, matters which the defendant claimed operated to release him from his liability as surety for the purchases alleged, thus in effect admitting the purchase, and a later plea of general performance, thus in effect traversing or denying them, is bad for repugnancy, and is subject to demurrer, or one of the pleas may be stricken out on motion. Wright v. Card, 16 R. I. 719, 19 Atl. 709.

And a special plea in an action on a bond, averring that the pleader and another were sureties for the principal, and that the principal failed to discharge the duties prescribed in the condition of the bond, and that the plaintiff had knowledge of such failure and did not notify the sureties thereof, but wilfully concealed such matters, thereby releasing him, is inconsistent with a plea of non est factum. Accident Ins. Co. v. Baker, 34 W. Va. 668, 12 S. E. 834.

But a denial by a defendant that he executed the order sued on, and an admission that he signed his name to a paper, but alleging that if his signature was attached to the order sued on the same was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation, are not wholly inconsistent with each other so as to warrant requiring the defendant to elect as to which defense he will rely on. Bird & M. Map Co. v. Jones, 27 Kan. 177.

And a plea in an action on a bond by sureties sued thereon of a settlement of all matters in difference between the plaintiff and the principal, and that the principal then gave his checks in full settlement and satisfaction of any and all liabilities and matters of difference between 48 L. R. A.

him and the plaintiff, is not inconsistent with a plea of non est factum. Accident Ins. Co. v. Baker, 34 W. Va. 668, 12 S. E. 834.

And a plea in an action on a bond that the plaintiff received and accepted from the principal therein two negotiable notes in full settlement and satisfaction of the breaches of the conditions of the alleged bond, is not necessarily inconsistent with a plea of non est factum. Ibid.

So, a plea in an action brought to recover the amount of several bonds, that the defendant did not owe the money demanded or any part thereof in manner and form as the plaintiff had alleged, is not inconsistent with a second plea in the same answer that the supposed writings were not, nor were any of them, the deed of the defendant. Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 355, 21 L. ed. 170.

And a denial of all the material allegations in a complaint in an action upon a bond, and an allegation that if the bond was executed as alleged it would for causes stated be inoperative, and that if the bond existed it should be treated as a mortgage, may be united in the same answer. Reed v. Reed, 93 N. C. 462.

And a denial in an action on a constable's official bond for wrongfully selling under execution, that the property levied upon was exempt, and an assertion that it was seized and sold on purchase-money judgments, and a plea of the general issue, are not inconsistent. State use of Cooley v. Samuels, 28 Mo. App. 649.

So, an answer alleging want of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the execution of a guaranty or acceptance of any benefit under it in an action in which the defendants may not have known anything of it, and an affirmative defense that if it was executed it was done in pursuance of a conspiracy to defraud the defendant, are not inconsistent, and may be included in the same answer. Corbitt v. Harrington, 14 Wash. 197, 44 Pac. 182.

In the above case, the principal case was distinguished and explained upon the ground that in that case it was held, in substance, that a defendant could not deny a fact of which he must have knowledge, in one part of an answer, and then in an affirmative defense admit the same fact and still claim the benefit of the denial.

For action on official bond of a treasurer, see Amador County v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526, supra, VI. b. 1.

As to action on an administrator's bond, see McNamara v. Jarvis, 2 La. Ann. 591, supra, VII. b. 2.

divided part thereof, and the court decided there that inconsistent defenses could be pleaded, but that these defenses were not inconsistent, because the defendant might be mistaken as to his legal title, and if he was he had the right to rely upon the title not being in the plaintiff. Barr v. Hack, 46 Iowa, 308, was a slander case, and the doctrine there announced was simply that which we have noticed in the decisions above.

We are at a loss to know why Wright v. Bacheller, 16 Kan. 259, was cited to sustain this doctrine, for there it was expressly said by the court that inconsistent pleas should not be encouraged; and while the case did not come up on instructions to the jury, the court below refused to allow the plaintiff to reply to an inconsistent averment in defendant's answer, and the supreme court held that such refusal on the part of the lower court to allow this averment to be put in issue by a reply was error, the defendant there having denied that she voluntarily or involuntarily executed a mortgage, and afterwards averring that, if she executed the mortgage, she was forced by her husband to execute the same against her will. And the court said: "These allegations are inconsistent with the affirmative allegations of the answer, for it cannot be true that she executed a mortgage under duress which she never executed. The setting up of inconsistent defenses like these should never be encouraged." The court expressly says that they do not pass upon the question as to whether the second defense stated in the answer was sufficient, as a defense, to require a reply thereto; that they express no opinion upon that subject, but that, assuming it to be such a defense, the court below erred in

So, under New York Code of Civil Procedure, § 507, entitling a defendant to set up as many defenses as he has, a defendant in an action upon a contract for services may set up that the plaintiff refused longer to continue in the employment of the defendant and left the employment without being discharged, and also that the defendant had sufficient reason for discharging the plaintiff, although the defenses may be inconsistent with each other, and the defendant would be entitled, as matter of right, to prove, not only that the employee left its services, but also that he had not performed the conditions of his contract, and that therefore the defendant was entitled to discharge him. Conklin v. Woodbury Dermatological Inst. 37 App. Div. 610, 56 N. Y. Supp. 258.

And while a plea of tender in an action for services rendered would be an implied admission of the employment under the old practice, under the Code, allowing a defendant to plead as many defenses as he may have, and requiring that a pleading shall be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice, an answer denying any employment, and also alleging that the services rendered were worth a sum much less than the amount paid, and a tender of the amount thus alleged, are not so absolutely repugnant as to make the tender of a smaller sum an admission that any sum is legally due. Clarke v. Lyon County, 7 Nev. 75.

So, a denial of the value of legal services sued for is not inconsistent with a special plea of payment. Collins v. Fenley, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 958, 53 S. W. 667.

And an answer in an action on an account for services, which contains a general denial of the essential facts of the petition, and avers that the charges in the itemized account are unreasonable and unjust, does not present inconsistent defenses. Cate v. Hutchinson, 58 Neb. 232, 78 N. W. 500.

And a plea that the defendants had paid the plaintiffs in full of all demands in an action to recover for personal services alleged to have been performed at defendants' request, by the plaintiff as an attorney at law, is not inconsistent with a general denial contained in the same answer, under the Minnesota system of pleading. Steenerson v. Waterbury, 52 Minn. 211, 53 N. W. 1140.

Nor is an answer in an action for labor and services, denying that the defendant ever employed the plaintiffs, necessarily inconsistent with another defense in the same answer, that the plaintiffs were guilty of gross negligence in the management of the business, as both may have been true; but if the defendant had denied the rendition of the services, and then alleged that they were negligently and unskillfully performed, the case would have been different. McDonald v. American Mortg. Co. 17 Or. 626, 21 Pac. 883.

But the allegations in an answer in an action for services rendered in performing a surgical operation upon the wife of the defendant, denying the rendition of the services, and alleging that the plaintiff undertook to treat the defendant's wife and performed an operation upon her, but that the operation was so unskillfully performed and badly managed that she died by reason thereof, and that they were worthless, detrimental, and injurious to the patient, are inconsistent within the meaning of Ky. Civ. Code, § 113, sub. 4, and the defendant should be required to elect on which defense he would rely. Black v. Holloway, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 694, 41 S. W. 576.

And a denial in a reply to an answer alleging that the plaintiff agreed to take his pay for work, labor, and materials in certain articles of property purchased by the defendant for a sum exceeding the demand of the plaintiff and delivered as directed by the plaintiff, because it was incorrect and not a true statement of the whole transaction, and also because the plaintiff had not sufficient knowledge thereof to form a belief, is inconsistent, and must be construed as a denial for want of sufficient knowledge or information to form a belief only, that denial in effect superseding the other. Lewis v. Ackers, 11 How. Pr. 163.

As to actions pertaining to contracts for services, see also Koll v. Bush, 6 Colo. App. 294, 40 Pac. 579; Schmid v. Busch, 97 Cal. 187, 31 Pac. 893, infra, VII. b. 1.

So, an answer in an action on insurance policies, which alleges a failure to furnish proofs of loss, and that the plaintiffs caused the premises to be burned, does not present inconsistent defenses. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Decker, 55 Neb. 346, 75 N. W. 841.

And if the plaintiff in an action on a fire-insurance policy fails to make and furnish preliminary proofs of loss in the manner and within the time required by the policy, such failure constitutes a defense to the action, and by going to trial on other grounds of defense set up in the answer, as well as upon grounds of want of preliminary proof, the defendant does not waive its right to insist upon the want of such proof as a defense, there being no inconsistency be-not allowing a reply to be filed. In Bruce v. Burr, 67 N. Y. 237, it was held that, in an action for breach of a contract of sale, the defendant might set up a rescission of the contract on the ground of fraud or mistake, and also breach of warranty on the part of the plaintiff. It is manifest that these defenses are not inconsistent, and that they both might be true, and both or either would be a proper defense to the action; for the plaintiff may have committed a fraud in procuring the contract, and he also may have been guilty of a breach of the warranty after the contract was procured. The case of Amador County v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526, in no way sustains the contention. Citizens' Bank v. Closson, 29 Ohio St. 78, was an action by the bank against Closson upon a promissory note alleged to have been made by him to R. R. Fenner & Co. and indorsed to the bank before due. Closson set up the following defenses: (1) He denied the execution of the note; (2) he alleged that if the signature to the note was his, it was obtained by a fraudulent and cunningly devised scheme or trick without his knowledge, setting forth the fact that he was induced by false and fraudulent representations of Fenner & Co. to sign certain papers, represented to be mere receipts or orders relating to a proposed agency for selling a patent invention, and that if he signed the note his signature was procured by making him believe that he was signing one of the receipts or orders, that it was obtained without consideration, and that the bank had knowledge of these facts when it purchased the note. The supreme court very properly held, and could not have held otherwise under any system of pleadings, that these defenses were all open tween the defenses. Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Frick, 29 Ohio St. 460.

And a defense in an action upon a beneficiary certificate of insurance issued by an association, that the plaintiff had been suspended for nonpayment of an assessment, and another defense in the same answer that he had been suspended for nonpayment of dues, are not inconsistent, where the two suspensions alleged were at different times and for different causes, as, notwithstanding the earlier, the defendant may have made a later suspension. Backdahl v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. 46 Minn. 61, 48 N. W. 451.

Nor is a defense in an action on an insurance policy that the policy was canceled inconsistent with a defense based on violation of conditions in the policy. H. A. Muckle Mfg. Co. v. Rutgers F. Ins. Co. 1 Minn. Dist. R. 3.

So, in Grady v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 60 Mo. 117, the court suggested that it was not deemed necessary to decide that the plea of non est factum in an action upon an insurance policy, and the further defense that the policy was issued upon property to be occupied as a boarding house, etc., were inconsistent pleas.

But a plea by insurers in an action on an insurance policy of nonpayment of a premium as a bar to a recovery in substance denies the existence of the contract, and is inconsistent with a plea set up in a supplemental answer of misrepresentation and concealment, and will be deemed to have been waived by the supplemental plea. Michael v. Mutual Ins. Co. of Nashville, 10 La. Ann. 737.

And an averment in an answer in an action upon an accident insurance policy, containing a stipulation that the insurance should not extend or cover injuries of which there should be no visible mark, expressly admitting that on the day alleged in the petition the deceased accidentally cut, lacerated, and wounded one of his fingers, is repugnant to and inconsistent with a plea in the same answer that there were no visible marks of the accident on the body of the deceased, and the plea would be demurrable. Bernays v. United States Mut. Accl. Asso. 45 Fed. Rep. 455.

And an allegation in an answer in an action on a policy of insurance on a building alleged to have been destroyed by a cyclone or hurricane, that the building was not blown down by the immediate action of a cyclone, tornado, or hurricane, will be controlled by a special allegation in the same answer that the building was destroyed as a result of a collision with a steamboat, which, by reason of the force of a high wind, was driven against the building, causing it to fall, as the special allegations constitute a confession that a tornado, cyclone, or hurricane caused the injury, and are therefore inconsistent with the allegation that the loss was not occasioned by a tornado, hurricane, or cyclone. Queen Ins. Co. v. Hudnut Co. 8 Ind. App. 22, 35 N. E. 397.

For another action against an insurance company see State, Crow, v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. 152 Mo. 1, 45 L. R. A. 363, 52 S. W. 545, infra, VII. b. 2. And see Moore v. Macon Sav. Bank, 22 Mo. App. 684, infra, VII. b. 2, as to denial of the instrument sued on, and an allegation of ratification of an alteration.

2. Actions pertaining to bills and notes.

A general denial in an action on a promissory note and a plea of the statute of limitations separately stated are not inconsistent with each other. Lawrence v. Peck, 3 S. Dak. 645, 54 N. W. 808; Schuchman v. Heath, 38 Mo. App. 280.

And the defendant cannot be compelled to elect between the two defenses. Lawrence v. Peck, 3 S. Dak. 645, 54 N. W. 808.

Though in legal theory the second defense would admit the execution of the note. McDonald v. Southern California R. Co. 101 Cal. 206, 35 Pac. 643, 646, dictum.

And a general denial in an action on an instrument for the payment of money and an allegation of payment are not inconsistent. Green v. Hughitt School Twp. 5 S. Dak. 452, 59 N. W. 224. But see infra, School Dist. No. 27 v. Holmes, 16 Neb. 486, 20 N. W. 721.

And a defendant in an action on a note should not be required to elect between a plea that he did not make the note and one that there was no consideration for the note. Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600. But see Brann v. Brann, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1814, 44 S. W. 424, infra.

So, a plea of payment in an action on promissory notes is not inconsistent with another plea in the same answer, denying the plaintiff's ownership. Cavitt v. Tharp, 30 Mo. App. 131.

And where there is no express admission of a note in an answer, but only an implied admission from silence, the insertion by amendment of an omitted denial is not necessarily inconsistent. Spencer v. Tooker, 12 Abb. Pr. 353.

And an admission by a defendant that he made the note in suit, but a denial that it was for his own benefit, and an assertion that it was for the benefit of the plaintiff, are not necesto the defendant. They are not in any sense inconsistent; for, even though the note was made as affirmed in the second defense, it would not be a legal execution of the note, and consequently does not contradict the first denial, viz., the denial of the execution of the note. The case of Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600, is exactly the same kind of a case, and is based upon the decision of the case of Citizens' Bank v. Closson, 29 Ohio St. 78, and the court says that it cannot be distinguished from that case. These are all the cases that are cited by Mr. Pomeroy to sustain the text, and we think it must be conceded, upon an investigation of them, that they absolutely fail to do so. Many of these cases are cited by the appellant in his reply brief. Many others, however, are cited, and an investigation of those cases convinces us that they are as far from sustaining the doctrine of inconsistent defenses as those cited by Mr. Pomeroy, which we have just reviewed.

Want of time prevents us from reviewing these cases in detail, but a careful examination of them convinces us that they go no further than the cases above reviewed, with the exception, possibly, of Stebbins v. Lardner, 2 S. Dak. 127, 48 N. W. 847, and this case is based upon the announcement of the text above referred to by Mr. Pomeroy, and cites the cases cited by that author to sustain the theory announced by the court. In none of the cases examined has it been held that an affirmative allegation by the defendant of a fact which, if true, would necessarily compel the conclusion that some other fact which had been pleaded in the same answer was false, can be sustained; and while much loose talk has been indulged in by the early inconsistent. Ostrom v. Bixby, 9 How. Pr. 57.

In the above case, Schneider v. Schultz, 4 Sandf. 664, and Roe v. Rogers, 8 How. Pr. 336, infra, VI. c. 4, were distinguished upon the ground that in those cases the pleas were not simply inconsistent, but one or the other of them was necessarily false.

So, pleas of non est factum and a denial of the assignment to plaintiff, and of want of consideration and payment in an action on promissory notes, are not inconsistent so as to warrant the court in requiring the defendant to elect between them. Patrick v. Boonville Gaslight Co. 17 Mo. App. 465.

Nor is a count in an answer in an action on a promissory note alleging usury, and another alleging payment, and a third alleging extension of time to the principal, whereby the surety was discharged, as all of them might in fact have existed and been proved. Shed v. Augustine, 14 Kan. 282.

And an allegation in an action on a note that the defendant is ignorant whether he signed the note or not, but does not believe he signed it and therefore denies it, and another allegation that if he did sign it his signature was obtained by fraud and without consideration, are not so inconsistent that the two defenses may not be made together in the same answer. Citizens' Bank v. Closson, 29 Ohio St. 78.

So, a plea of want of consideration, and another that the note sued on was not the note of the alleged maker thereof, constitute distinct and independent defenses, and are not so inconsistent as to preclude their being interposed together in the same suit. Barnes v. Scott, 29 Fla. 285, 11 So. 48; Hummel v. Moore, 25 Fed. Rep. 380.

And allegations of an agreement by the payee to cancel, and another to deliver up, the note, are not subject to objection for inconsistency under the Colorado Code. Hummel v. Moore, 25 Fed. Rep. 380.

And a plea of failure of consideration, and another plea of compensation, in a proceeding to stay process upon promissory notes, are not inconsistent or in conflict with each other. Phillips v. W. T. Adams Mach. Co. 52 La. Ann. 442, 27 So. 65.

And the defendant may plead payments or partial payment and partial failure of consideration, or any other fact, to show that he is no longer liable on the note. School Dist. No. 27 v. Holmes, 16 Neb. 486, 20 N. W. 721, dictum.

And he may claim that the note is forged, and also that he has paid it, and also that it is 48 L. R. A.

barred. McDonald v. Southern California R. Co. 101 Cal. 208, 35 Pac. 643, 646, dictum.

And when an answer contains a special defense by one of the defendants in an action upon a promissory note alleging that the defendant was not the surety of the principal debtor but joined in the execution of the notes for the accommodation of the plaintiff to enable him to raise money upon them as collateral, and also alleging that if he were liable as surety, the principal maker had put in plaintiff's hands sufficient wheat to pay them, directing that the proceeds be applied upon the original note, and that they did not so apply them, though such defenses should have been separately pleaded, where no objection was taken by motion to require them to be separately stated, objection to evidence under it on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense is properly overruled. Eppinger v. Kendrick, 114 Cal. 620, 46 Pac. 613, 44 Pac. 234.

But a verified pleading must be construed so as to make all its parts, if possible, harmonious with each other; and an answer by defendant in an action on a note setting up two defenses, the first denying that he made the note for a valuable consideration, and the second alleging that the note was made for the purpose of being deposited with the plaintiff temporarily until the happening of a certain event which had happened, and that therefore the plaintiff had no right to the note, must be construed as meaning that in his view of the law the matter set forth in the second plea did not constitute a consideration, and therefore if the second plea were to be deemed a sufficient consideration the defense would fail, if it were not sustained by evidence at the trial. Byle v. Harrington, 4 Abb. Pr. 421.

And a general denial in an action upon a promissory note, and a special defense alleging that the note was executed by the defendants as sureties only, and that they did not receive any part of the consideration, are inconsistent, and the plaintiff will not be put upon proof of their allegations. Lamberton v. Shannon, 13 Wash. 404, 43 Pac. 336.

So, a plea of no consideration in an action upon a promissory note is inconsistent with an admission that the note was executed in part payment for a lot of land, though it is claimed that the land was of less value than the face of the note. Ryan v. Middleborough Town-Lands Co. (Ky.) 52 S. W. 33.

And a denial of the execution and delivery of a note, and an affirmative answer admitting courts concerning the pleading of inconsistent defenses, when the facts involved in the cases are scrutinized, it can easily be ascertained that the courts have never announced the rule established under the Code pleading where the answer has to be verified by oath, that the pleader will be allowed to compel the plaintiff to enter upon the investigation of a state of facts which, if admitted to be true, would subject the defendant to the penalties of perjury. There are other cases, however, that have decided this question as we are deciding it now, and the courts in those cases have spoken with no uncertain sound. It is not difficult to tell what they have decided. They base their decisions on principle, and sustain them with practical and cogent reasoning. Chief among these cases is that of Derby v. Gallup, 5 Minn. 119, Gil. 85. The opinion of the judge in that case, says Mr. Pomeroy, in his notes, "is very able and difficult to be answered on principle," thus showing that the sympathy of that learned author was with this line of decisions, and that the rule he announced was based upon a false conception of the authorities quoted. In conclusion, this much, at least, must be demanded: That, however diversified the answers may be, they must all contain the essential element of truth, and if the admission of the truth of one answer necessarily proves the falsity of another, they cannot be allowed to stand, and the plaintiff will not be compelled to sustain the truth of an allegation the truthfulness of which is asserted by the defendant.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Hoyt, Ch. J., and Scott, Anders, and Gordon, JJ., concur.

the execution of the note and a mortgage given to secure it, and alleging that they were made and received without consideration and for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding creditors, are inconsistent, and the admission would render proof of the execution and delivery of the note unnecessary. Maxwell v. Bolles, 28 Or. 1, 41 Pac. 661.

And where the defendant pleads non est factum, the only issue which the court can try is whether the defendant had executed the note, and the defendant will not be permitted also to allege payment, as the defenses are inconsistent, and the defense of payment will be stricken out. Sheppard v. Starrett, 35 Mo. 367.

So, a general denial in the answer in an action on an instrument for the payment of money is inconsistent with a plea of part payment. School Dist. No. 27 v. Holmes, 16 Neb. 486, 20 N. W. 721. But see Green v. Hughitt School Twp., 5 S. Dak. 452, 59 N. W. 224, supra.

And a plea of no consideration for a promissory note admits the execution of the note and puts in issue only the fact that it was given for a valuable consideration, and a plea of non est factum denies both the execution and delivery of the paper, and when such pleas are united in the same answer they are inconsistent, within the meaning of Ky. Civ. Code, § 113, subd. 4, and the defendant should be required to elect upon which defense he should rely. Brann v. Brann, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 1814, 44 S. W. 424. But see Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600, supra. See also Shannon v. Pearson, 10 Iowa, 588, Appx.; Robins v. Maidstone, 7 Jur. 694, 12 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 321, 4 Q. B. 511. Dav. & M. 30; Ryan v. Middlesborough Town-Lands Co. (Ky.) 52 S. W. 83, — infra, VII. b. 1; Naba v. Carlin, 3 Mart. N. S. 373; Ferguson v. Thomas, 3 Mart. N. S. 75; Kimman v. Cannetax, 34 Mo. 147, — infra, VII. b. 2.

3. Actions pertaining to sales.

A defense in an action on an account for goods sold that the balance sued for was the result of wagering contracts known as options and futures, and another that the plaintiff as defendant's agent disobeyed his orders and directions, thus causing loss, are not so inconsistent as to warrant requiring the defendant to elect between them. Grier Commission Co. v. Dockstader, 47 Mo. App. 42.

And an answer in an action for the purchase price of fruit trees, setting up two defenses, one that the trees were never delivered, and the other that the order was obtained by fraudulent representations that the trees ordered were raised in one place, whereas they were raised in another, is not subject to objection for inconsistency. Roblee v. Secrest, 28 Minn. 43, 6 N. W. 904.

So, a defense of breach of warranty in an action for the balance of the purchase price of a machine, and an allegation that the sale was by sample, and that it was agreed that the machine delivered was to be equal in quality and description to the sample, and that it was not equal to the sample, and that the machine purchased had been returned, are not inconsistent so as to warrant requiring the defendant to elect upon which he will rely. Gammon v. Ganfield, 42 Minn. 368, 44 N. W. 125.

And a general denial in an action to avoid a sale of negroes on account of defects alleged to have been warranted against, and a second or amended plea averring that the auctioneer who sold the slaves declared at the time that they must be examined by the physician of the purchaser, but that the purchaser removed them without examination, are not inconsistent, and an instruction that the second plea was a waiver of the general denial, and that it admitted the liability of the defendant to refund the price of the slaves for the defects stated, is properly denied. Andrews v. Hensler, 6 Wall. 254, 18 L. ed. 737.

And a defense in an action for the purchase price of a machine based upon a warranty, and another based upon the fact that the machine was brought for a specific purpose made known at the time, and that it proved utterly worthless for that purpose, are not inconsistent. Keystone Implement Co. v. Leonard, 40 Mo. App. 477.

Nor is an answer in an action for the purchase price of goods sold setting up a breach of warranty as to quality, and also that the sale was induced by fraudulent representations, subject to objection for inconsistency, as both pleas might be true. Kelly v. Bernheimer, 3 Thomp. & C. 140.

And a plea of a parol warranty of the goodness of a note taken for the purchase price of goods sold, and of the solvency of the maker, in an answer in an action for a breach of the contract of sale on the part of the defendants, is not objectionable as inconsistent with a plea in the same answer, of a right of rescission founded upon fraud or mistake. Bruce v. Burr, 67 N. Y. 237.

But an answer in an action on a note alleging in one paragraph that the note was given in part payment for a wheat harvesting and binding machine purchased by the defendant, and that there was a breach of warranty in the sale, and that the plaintiff did not become the owner or holder of the note until after maturity, and alleging in another paragraph that if the plaintiff became such owner it was only for the purpose of collecting it, is so inconsistent, indefinite, and illogical as to render the second paragraph demurrable. Second Nat. Bank v. Hart, 8 Ind. App. 19, 35 N. E. 302.

And a party cannot deny a sale, delivery, and acceptance under the Missouri system of pleading, and then in the same answer admit the sale and attempt an avoidance. Darrett v. Donnelly, 38 Mo. 494.

So, in Hamilton v. Hough, 18 How. Pr. 14, it was held that an answer to a complaint for a balance due for goods sold, denying that the plaintiff ever sold to the defendant any goods which had not been paid for, and alleging that if the plaintiff ever sold any goods to the defendant they were sold on credit, and that the term of credit had not expired, is bad; but the decision was put upon the ground that both the allegations were unauthorized, and not that they were inconsistent.

4. Actions pertaining to negligence and for assault.

A defense in an action for damages for death alleged to have been caused by negligence, denying negligence, and also alleging that if there was any negligence on the part of the defendants, the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, is not objectionable as setting up inconsistent pleas. Pugh v. Oregon Improv. Co. 14 Wash. 331, 44 Pac. 547, 689; Millan v. Southern R. Co. 54 S. C. 485, 32 S. E. 539.

And denying the original existence of any liability in an action for damages, and setting up a release of whatever might be due on such claim, are not inconsistent so as to warrant striking out one of the defenses. Kellogg v. Baker, 15 Abb. Pr. 286.

So, an answer in an action by an administrator for the death of his intestate, alleging that after the commencement of the suit the defendant made a settlement with the widow of the decedent and paid to her a certain sum in full of all damages on account of the death of her husband, and agreed to pay in addition thereto the costs, and alleging payment of the costs, is not bad as setting up the distinct defenses of a compromise and settlement and a payment in release, as the allegations as to payment merely show the completion of the compromise. Yelton v. Evansville & I. R. Co. 134 Ind. 414, 21 L. R. A. 158, 33 N. E. 629.

But sustaining a demurrer in an action against a woman for negligently keeping a dangerous dog which injured the plaintiff, to a plea by the defendant that she was a married woman living at the time with her husband in conjugal relations, which at common law was a good ground of abatement, if error, is cured and rendered harmless where she also interposes the plea of the general issue, under which she is not only entitled to make the defense she could have made under the plea to which the demurrer was sustained, but she actually introduces proof and has the jury pass on the identical question she sought to present by the special plea. Strouse v. Leipt, 101 Ala. 433, 23 L. R. A. 622, 14 So. 667.

For another action pertaining to negligence, see Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935, infra, VII. b. 1.

as committed in self-defense or in defense of his possession of his real estate; but these are distinct defenses, and must be separately pleaded. Johnson v. Gibson, 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 433.

And defenses in an action for an unlawful battery, consisting of a general denial of the alleged trespass and of justification of the defendant's acts, do not admit that the acts of the defendant were unlawful, and are not therefore inconsistent, either at common law or under the Missouri statute. Rhine v. Montgomery, 50 Mo. 566.

Under some of the earlier New York cases, decided soon after the Code was enacted, however, the rule seems to have been different.

Thus, the defendant in an action for an assault and battery cannot first deny the assault and then set up that if there was any injury to the plaintiff it was occasioned by an assault which he previously made on the defendant, and the latter allegation will be stricken out. Schneider v. Schultz, 4 Sandf. 664.

And a general denial in an answer to a complaint in an action for assault and battery and false imprisonment, and a further defense setting up new matter in justification of the alleged assault, cannot be set up in the same answer, as they are inconsistent. Roe v. Rogers, 5 How. Pr. 356.

For another action for assault under the Missouri statute, see Rhine v. Montgomery, 50 Mo. 566, infra, VII. b. 2.

5. Actions pertaining to personal property.

A denial in an action for the recovery of personal property, that the plaintiff was the owner, and that he had at any time possession thereof, and that the defendants took the property from the possession of the plaintiff, is not inconsistent with or waived by new matter set up in the same answer, to the effect that the property was taken by the defendant as sheriff by virtue of a writ of attachment. Billings v. Drew, 52 Cal. 565.

And a defense of non cepit, and an allegation of property in the defendant or in a stranger in a replevin action, are not so inconsistent that they cannot be pleaded together. Shutter v. Page, 11 Johns. 196.

And a general denial and an averment that the taking was justifiable, in an action for the taking of personal property, are not inconsistent either under 4 & 5 Anne, chap. 16, §§ 4, 5, or under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 352, § 23, under which non cepit and a justification might be set up together, the one merely denying a wrongful taking, and the other, though admitting that the defendant took the property, setting up that he took it rightfully. Foster v. Henry (N. Y.) 5 Alb. L. J. 173.

Under the New York system of pleading a defendant in an action to recover the possession of personal property may set up a general denial together with a justification, in his answer, where they are separately pleaded, as they are not inconsistent defenses. Hackley v. Ogmun, 10 How. Pr. 44.

So, a reply to an answer in an action for replevin in which the answer alleged that the property was taken under a distress warrant for rent in arrear, alleging, first, that plaintiff did not hold as tenant as alleged, and, second, that no part of the supposed rent was in arrear, though subject to objection under the common law, is not so under the provisions of the Kentucky statute authorizing as many pleas, either of law or fact, as the party may deem proper. Roberts v. Tennell, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 287.

And the defendant in an action for the recovery of the possession of property claimed under a chattel mortgage may by denial put the plaintiff to the proof of the execution of the chattel mortgage, and by a proper plea show that if the said alleged mortgage was in fact executed or bore his signature, it was the result of a conspiracy entered into by another with the plaintiff for the purpose of defrauding creditors, and that it was without consideration and void, such defenses not being inconsistent. Veasey v. Humphreys, 27 Or. 515, 41 Pac. 8.

And an answer putting in issue the allegation in the complaint that the defendant wrongfully detained and refused to deliver goods sought to be recovered, and also setting up title in the defendant under an assignment, is good. Goodwin v. Werthelmer, 90 N. Y. 149, 1 N. E. 404.

But a general denial in an action of replevin for the recovery of cattle which contained separate defenses, in which the defendant admitted that the plaintiffs were the owners of the cattle, and that the defendant detained them, can be considered only as a denial that the plaintiffs were entitled to immediate possession of the property, and that the defendant wrongfully detained them, and it would devolve upon the defendant to show that he had a right of possession. Yandle v. Crane, 13 Kan. 344.

For another action with relation to the recovery of personality, see Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 39, infra, VII. b. 1.

So, a denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief in an action for conversion, as to whether the property alleged to be converted belonged to the plaintiff, is not inconsistent with an allegation that the goods were delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, and that the defendant claims to hold them as securities for moneys advanced thereon by him, as there may be many cases where a party pledges property of which he is not the owner. Townsend v. Platt, 3 Abb. Pr. 324.

And a defense in an action for the carrying away and detention of personal property, that the property was delivered to the defendant as the agent of the owner, will not be stricken out as sham because the answer contains another defense in which it is averred that the property was taken by virtue of a writ of replevin, though the two are regarded as so inconsistent that one of them must be false, where there is nothing in the record from which it can be said which is the false one. Duffield v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 5 Colo. App. 25, 36 Pac. 622.

Nor is a denial by a defendant of ever having received securities alleged to have been given him as collateral inconsistent with another defense to the effect that if he did receive them they were lost without his fault, so as to narrow the issue to the question whether or not he did ever receive the securities. Willard v. Giles, 24 Wis. 319.

And a general denial in an action brought against a carrier to recover the value of a certain trunk and its contents, and a special plea averring that the defendant had tendered the trunk with its contents in good condition to the plaintiff, are not subject to the objection of inconsistency under the Wyoming statute, as both pleas may be true. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Warren, 3 Wyo. 134, 6 Pac. 724.

But under the early Code practice in New York a carrier by water was not permitted to answer, in an action for failure to deliver goods shipped, that he was not the owner of the vessel, and also that the property shipped was delivered to the plaintiff, as the two defenses are inconsistent. Arnold v. Dimon, 4 Sandf. 680.

And a general and specific denial of each and every allegation in the complaint in an action of trover for the conversion of certain personal property, and another allegation in the same answer stating that the property was taken by virtue of a writ of attachment, are held to be inconsistent with each other in Minnesota, and the taking of the property would be deemed admitted. Derby v. Gallup, 5 Minn. 119, Gil. 85.

In the above case, Shuter v. Page, 11 Johns. 196, and other cases under the old system of practice sustaining analogous pleas were explained and distinguished, the court saying that the cases in which similar pleas have been sustained have arisen under statutes, so far as it had examined, similar to that of 4 Anne. 16. § 4, which provides that it shall be lawful for any defendant in any action or suit with leave of the court to plead as many several matters thereto as he shall think necessary for his defense, while the Code does not authorize such pleading, or any fictitious pleading, and the decisions of the court must depend upon the construction to be given to the provisions of the Code on the subject of pleading.

So, an answer in an action against a warehouseman for the value of goods deposited for safe-keeping which were lost, setting up a denial of the alleged bailment, and that the goods were destroyed by irresistible force and without fault of the defendant, and the statute of limitations, is good, and the plea of the statute of limitations cannot be stricken out for inconsistency. Cohrs v. Frazer, 5 S. C. N. S. 351.

And a general denial in an action for a misappropriation of money is not modified or affected by an allegation in the answer that the money was paid to the plaintiff by a third party before the commencement of the action, by the transfer to him of a designated number of shares of the capital stock of a corporation, and by a payment in cash, as the two defenses are not inconsistent. First Nat. Bank v. Lincoln, 36 Minn. 132, 30 N. W. 449.

6. Actions pertaining to realty.

A defendant in an action of ejectment may deny the title of the plaintiff, and also plead the statute of limitations, as such defenses are not inconsistent, and are not such as he would be required to elect between. Willson v. Cleaveland, 30 Cal. 192.

And they are not so inconsistent, even under the Missouri practice, as to relieve the plaintiff from the necessity of proving title upon the theory that the plea of the statute of limitations was a confession of the plaintiff's original right. Nelson v. Brodhack, 44 Mo. 596, 100 Am. Dec. 328.

And a mere statutory suggestion of three years' adverse possession, made in a statutory action of ejectment with a view to the ascertainment of an allowance for the value of permanent improvements under Ala. Code, §§ 702-705, is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the plea of not guilty, and will not be stricken from the file on motion. Newsom v. Guy, 109 Ala. 305, 19 So. 443.

And an allegation by defendants in an action of ejectment in their answer, that they have had adverse possession for ten years continuously next preceding the action, claiming under an administrator's deed, does not disprove another allegation therein that they paid the purchase money to the legal representative of the former owner in good faith, in consideration of which they received from him a deed believed at the time to be valid and effectual, but which, owing to informalities of proceedings in the probate court, was not effectual to pass title, claiming thereon a right to have purchase money and taxes paid refunded; and therefore the two defenses may be pleaded together. Schaefer v. Causey, 8 Mo. App. 142.

So, a defense in an action for the recovery of real estate in which the defendant's claim of title is set out in the complaint, denying such claim and averring a different one, and pleading the statute of limitations, and alleging that by mistake the deed under which they claimed appeared to convey a life estate when it was intended to convey a fee simple, asking for a correction and reformation of the deed, is competent under the present system of pleading in North Carolina authorizing a defendant to plead inconsistent defenses if separately stated. McLamb v. McPhail (N. C.) 35 S. E. 426.

And when an answer in such an action denies the title of the plaintiff, and also sets up the statute of limitations and several other affirmative defenses, the affirmative defenses are immaterial, and need not be specially noticed, where the question sought to be presented by them properly arises on the trial under the general denial of title. Rhodes v. Gunn, 35 Ohio St. 387.

And an answer in an action in ejectment denying generally every fact alleged in the petition except possession, and averring possession under a judicial sale, and setting up the statute of limitations, and giving a detailed history of the title to the land from a sale by the United States, and the execution of a deed, under a mortgage foreclosure, to the defendant, and referring to an alleged defect in the deed by the death of a party in interest before the commencement of the foreclosure, and asking that if his title should fall upon the other defenses, and by reason of the defect, he should be granted equitable relief and protection to the full amount of the note and interest and taxes and interest, and the value of the improvements which he had placed on the premises, is not inconsistent. Goodman v. Nichols, 44 Kan. 22, 23 Pac. 957.

So, a verified answer in an action to recover a mining claim, denying that the plaintiffs ever had title or possession, is not inconsistent with another allegation that if the plaintiffs ever had title to the claim they had abandoned and forfeited it, and the defendant should not be required to elect between them, or precluded from introducing proof of the abandonment and forfeiture. Beil v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671.

And a plea by the defendant in a real action that he was the owner of the entire estate, and another plea that he was the owner of an undivided part thereof, that two other designated persons were owners also, though inconsistent, will not, under Or. Code, § 72, authorizing a defendant to plead any or all the defenses he may have in the same answer, be subject to exception therefor, as he may have been mistaken as to his legal title and still be entitled to maintain his possession under special defenses. Moore v. Willamette Transp. & Locks Co. 7 Or. 355.

And a special plea in an action of ejectment brought by a town for possession of alluvial land claimed as a westerly extension of a street, alleged to have been dedicated to the water edge, that the defendant was not at the time of the commencement of the suit in possession of any part of the street, and has not and does not claim any interest in it, and another allegation that he was and now is in possession of a piece of land lying west of the west end of the street which is covered by the buildings described in the declaration, but that he was not guilty of the wrong and injury complained of, are not subject to demurrer on the ground of inconsistency in the pleas. Scranton v. Bosarge (Miss.) 19 So. 194.

And a demurrer to a cross complaint will not be sustained because of inconsistency where general allegations are to the effect that the defendants are the equitable owners of the land in dispute and are in possession thereof, unless his specific allegations alleged to be inconsistent show that they have no title. Warbritton v. Demorett, 129 Ind. 346, 27 N. E. 730, 28 N. E. 613.

But a plea of not guilty in an action in ejectment is a conclusive admission of possession, and puts in issue the title, and a disclaimer is an admission of plaintiff's title but denies the possession, and the two cannot be pleaded together, as they are inconsistent with each other. Torrey v. Forbes, 94 Ala. 135, 10 So. 320; Bernstein v. Humes, 60 Ala. 582, 31 Am. Rep. 52; McQueen v. Lampley, 74 Ala. 408.

And a defense in an action for the recovery of lands denying all right in the plaintiffs and insisting that the plaintiffs' ancestor never had any interest in the premises, is inconsistent with another defense in the same answer in which the defendant asserts his own right as a purchaser of the interest of one of the plaintiffs derived from such ancestor, and the defendant should be compelled to elect between them. Fugate v. Pierce, 49 Mo. 441.

For actions in the nature of ejectment, see also Miller v. Chandler, 59 Cal. 540; Morris v. Henderson, 37 Miss. 492; McQueen v. Lampley, 74 Ala. 408; Bernstein v. Humes, 60 Ala. 582, 31 Am. Rep. 52, —infra, VII. b, 1; Farrell v. Hennessy, 21 Wis. 633; Orton v. Noonan, 19 Wis. 351; Sexton v. Rhames, 13 Wis. 99; Miller v. Larson, 17 Wis. 624; Butler v. Kauback, 8 Kan. 671; Ledbetter v. Ledbetter, 88 Mo. 62, —infra, VII. b, 2.

So, a defense in an answer in an action to recover upon a land contract that the contract was obtained by false and fraudulent representations, and a counterclaim therein to recover damages for breach of the contract by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to grade, gravel, and sidewalk a street as agreed in the contract, are not inconsistent so that the counterclaim would constitute a waiver of the right of the defendant to rescind the contract for fraud. South Milwaukee Boulevard Heights Co. v. Harte, 95 Wis. 592, 70 N. W. 821.

And a counterclaim in an action to recover the second instalment upon a land contract the object of which was to recover the first instalment on the ground that the contract was induced by false and fraudulent representations and had been rescinded, is not inconsistent with a second counterclaim to recover damages for breach of the contract, so as to warrant the rejection of evidence under the first counterclaim on the ground that the defendant was estopped by the admission in the second counterclaim. Ibid.

So, an answer in an action for trespass denying the plaintiff's title, and also setting up a license to do the act complained of, is not subject to objection for inconsistency so as to constitute an admission of the plaintiff's title as set up in the complaint. Booth v. Sherwood, 12 Minn. 426, Gil. 310.

And a general denial in an action for a wrongful act consisting in the removal of a fence, and a justification and limitation of three years, are not so inconsistent as to deprive the defendant of the right to invoke the statute of limitations. McCormick v. Kaye, 41 Mo. App. 263.

And not guilty and justification and accord and satisfaction may be joined in trespass under the Maine system of pleading. Granite State Bank v. Otis, 53 Me. 133, dictum.

And a denial in an action for trespass that the plaintiff either owned the property upon which the trespass was claimed to have been committed, or was ever entitled to its possession, and an allegation of possession in the defendant and those under whom he claimed for a long period, and that while so in possession the plaintiff, against the will of the defendant, entered upon the lands and commenced to cut hay, which possession so wrongfully taken was the only possession the plaintiff ever had, may be pleaded together, as the inconsistency is inferential and remote. Burnham v. Call, 2 Utah, 433.

But where, in an action to enjoin defendants from trespassing on lands and cutting and removing timber therefrom, the defendant for an affirmative defense alleged a contract on the part of the plaintiff as administratrix whereby she sold the timber to the defendant, a reply to the affirmative matter admitting the contract of sale, but averring that it included only part of the premises, and a further reply that she had never obtained any authority from the court to enter into the contract, and had no right or authority to sell the timber, is inconsistent, and the second defense should be stricken out. Davis v. Ford, 15 Wash. 107, 45 Pac. 739, 46 Pac. 393.

As to trespass to title, see also Koenigheim v. Miles, 67 Tex. 116, 2 S. W. 81, infra, VII. a.; Grash v. Sater, 6 Iowa, 302; Child v. Allen, 33 Vt. 476; Wiggins v. Wiggins, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 335, 40 S. W. 643, infra, VII. b. 1.

See also, as to actions for damages to realty, McCord v. Doniphan Branch R. Co. 21 Mo. App. 92, infra, VII. b. 2.

So, a denial in an answer in an action to quiet title, of all allegations of the petition necessary for the establishment of a trust in the lands, is not inconsistent with a further defense that at the time of their purchase of the land and before payment of the consideration the defendants applied to the plaintiff for information concerning the title, and received their conveyance in reliance upon the information received. Blodgett v. McMurtry, 39 Neb. 210, 57 N. W. 985.

And a count in an answer in an action by the holder of a tax title to quiet his title, consisting of a general denial, and another, setting up facts showing the plaintiff's title to the land to be invalid, and a third alleging that after a previous judgment was rendered and before it was vacated the plaintiff sold the land in question and appropriated the proceeds to his own use, praying for a recovery of the value of the land, are not repugnant or inconsistent or improperly joined. Flint v. Dulany, 37 Kan. 332, 15 Pac. 208.

Nor is an answer in an action for the cancellation of a deed alleged to be a forgery as a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, containing a general denial and affirming the genuineness of the deed, and another allegation that the defendant's husband, since deceased, was the owner of the property and deeded it to the plaintiff without consideration, in trust to hold the naked legal title for the benefit of such husband of the defendant and to reconvey to him or any other person at his request, and that the deed in suit was made pursuant to such trust, subject to objection for inconsistency, and the defendant cannot be required to elect upon which 48 L. R. A.

defense he will rely. Keane v. Kyne, 2 Mo. App. 317.

So, an admission in an answer in an action by a landlord against a tenant to recover rent, that the defendant is indebted for rent, is not inconsistent with a counterclaim for repairs made by the defendant for which the plaintiff agreed to pay him. Hausman v. Mulheran, 68 Minn. 48, 70 N. W. 866.

And an allegation in the answer in an action to recover rent under a lease alleging a parol contract to lease the building from month to month, and a further defense that the said building, by reason of the acts and omissions of the plaintiff, became untenable, whereby the defendants were evicted, are not inconsistent with each other. Kilne v. Hanke, 14 Mont. 361, 38 Pac. 454.

Nor are defenses to a suit for rent, of want of consideration for the lease, or, in case of that defense failing, of the right to an accounting because the lessor had resumed possession of and used the leased property, or by way of cross petition for judgment for a sum agreed on for the lessor's violation of his covenant in the lease, inconsistent, and no election by defendant can be required. Hooven & A. Co. v. National Cordage Co. 27 Ohio L. J. 18.

As to actions for rent, see also Knight v. M'Douall, 12 Ad. & El. 438, 4 Jur. 939, 4 Perry & D. 168, infra, VII. b. 1; Van Holten v. Lewis, 1 McCord, L. 12, supra, IV. c.

So, while ordinarily a general denial in an answer would seem to be inconsistent with any allegation in avoidance of the facts set out in the complaint, the defendant in an action to foreclose a mortgage may unite in the same answer a general denial, and a plea that the defendant was made a party solely on the ground that he has or claims to have some interest in or lien upon the mortgaged premises accruing subsequently to the lien of the mortgage, and an allegation that the lien on the mortgaged premises existed under a judgment against the mortgagor prior to the attaching of the lien under the mortgage, and that the claims for which the mortgage were given had been paid. Woods v. Reiss, 78 Hun. 80, 29 N. Y. Supp. 263.

And a denial by the defendants in an action to foreclose a mortgage, that they are junior lienors, and an allegation that they are senior lienors, are not so inconsistent with an allegation of payment as to warrant the granting of an order to make the pleading more definite and certain. Moody v. Beldon, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 89, 15 N. Y. Supp. 119.

And an allegation in an answer in an action brought to enforce a mechanic's lien that the defendant has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether or not the material mentioned was furnished by the plaintiff, is not, under Wag. (Mo.) Stat. p. 1010, providing that different consistent defenses may be separately stated in the same answer, inconsistent with another allegation that certain work done upon the building was done so unskillfully and in such an unworkmanlike manner as to cause the defendant great damage, asking judgment therefor, and denying that the plaintiff at any time gave him notice that he held the claim against the property. McAdow v. Ross, 53 Mo. 109.

In the above case, Fugate v. Pierce, 49 Mo. 441, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the two positions maintained by the defendant were entirely irreconcilable, and could not both stand together, and were clearly within the prohibition of the law.

But a general denial in an answer in an action to foreclose a mortgage is inconsistent with an allegation that the defendant executed the mortgage under duress, and such allegations should not be encouraged; and in such case where it was the intention of the plaintiff in replying to put at issue all the material allegations of the defendant's answer he should be allowed to amend his reply so as to be able to litigate the question of duress upon its merits. Wright v. Bacheller, 16 Kan. 259.

And a plea in such an action claiming title to the mortgaged premises, and another alleging that the defendant has a mortgage on the premises for a certain sum, praying that in case the court finds his title invalid he may have a decree for the amount due on his mortgage, are inconsistent with each other, and on application made at the proper time it is the duty of the court to require the defendant to elect upon which he will rely. Shellenbarger v. Biser, 5 Neb. 195.

As to actions for foreclosure, see also Siter v. Jewett, 33 Cal. 92, infra, VII. b. 1; Adair v. Adair, 78 Mo. 630; Dickson v. Cole, 34 Wis. 621, —infra, VII. b. 2.

7. Actions for libel or slander.

The earlier decisions in some of the Code states, probably in an effort to assimilate Code practice with the common law, gave a much more strict construction to pleas on the question of inconsistency than the later ones, particularly in actions for libel and slander.

Thus, a defendant in an action for slander, who denies uttering the words charged, cannot justify by alleging their truth, as the pleas are inconsistent. Ormsby v. Douglass, 2 Abb. Pr. 407; Meyer v. Schultz, 4 Sandf. 664; Jackson v. Stetson, 15 Mass. 48; Alderman v. French, 1 Pick. 1, 11 Am. Dec. 114.

When a defendant in an action for slander intends to justify the speaking of the slanderous words, he must set up facts which will show the plaintiff guilty of the act imputed to him, and a denial of every allegation in the complaint, and an allegation that if he did speak the slanderous words alleged the same are true, cannot be combined in the same answer. Sayles v. Wooden, 6 How. Pr. 84.

And if they are combined the admission in the latter plea is admissible and legal evidence for the plaintiff on the general issue relieving the plaintiff from proving the speaking of the words. Jackson v. Stetson, 15 Mass. 48; Alderman v. French, 1 Pick. 1, 11 Am. Dec. 114.

So, while a defendant in an action for slander could admit or deny or set up new matter in avoidance, he could not deny that he uttered the defamatory words alleged, and then aver that if he did utter them he uttered them with reference to the nonperformance of a certain contract whereby great injury and injustice had been done to him by the plaintiff. Porter v. McCreedy, Code Rep. N. S. 88.

And an answer in an action for slander, which first denies that the defendant ever spoke the alleged slanderous words, and then asserts that if it be proved that he did speak them he will then prove certain facts in justification, is bad. Lewis v. Kendall, 6 How. Pr. 59.

The provision of N. Y. Code, § 165, permitting the defendant to allege mitigating circumstances, was limited to cases in which he pleaded the truth of the matter charged as defamatory. Meyer v. Schultz, 4 Sandf. 664.

And a plea in an action for slander that the words were spoken privately or confidentially or in the course of legal proceedings, which would, if true, excuse him whether the words were true or not, is inconsistent with another plea setting forth the truth of the words alleged to have been spoken, as the effect of this defense is that he spoke the words because he knew them to be true. Jackson v. Stetson, 15 Mass. 48.

A more liberal rule, however, was adopted by the later cases after the theory of the Code had become more thoroughly understood.

Under the rule subsequently adopted, a denial in an action of slander of having spoken the words charged and an averment of their truth, are consistent defenses which may be separately stated in the same answer, as it does not necessarily follow that the defendants spoke the words because they are true. Payson v. Macomber, 3 Allen, 69; Barr v. Hack, 46 Iowa, 308; Cole v. Woodson, 32 Kan. 272, 4 Pac. 321; Jones v. McDowell, 4 Bibb, 188; Rooney v. Tierney, 82 Ky. 252; Horton v. Banner, 6 Bush, 596; Buhler v. Wentworth, 17 Barb. 649; Weston v. Lumley, 33 Ind. 486; Kelly v. Craig, 9 Humph. 215; Peters v. Ulmer, 74 Pa. 403.

And he may also plead the statute of limitations. Kelly v. Craig, 9 Humph. 215.

And a defendant in an action for slander, who sets up the defense of not guilty and also a justification, should not be compelled to elect upon which defense he will stand. Horton v. Banner, 6 Bush, 596; Ormsby v. Douglass, 2 Abb. Pr. 407, 5 Duer, 665; Cole v. Woodson, 32 Kan. 272, 4 Pac. 321.

Especially where the answer is verified, as it may be true, not only that he did not speak the words charged, but also that the plaintiff committed the offense which they impute. Ormsby v. Douglass, 2 Abb. Pr. 407, 5 Duer, 665; Murphy v. Carter, 1 Utah, 17.

And where, in an action for libel and slander, the defendant has asserted several inconsistent pleas in the same answer, and among them one justifying by asserting the truth of the supposed libelous matter, that plea will not be taken as a circumstance tending to show malice, on the ground that the plea was inconsistent with the evidence. Express Printing Co. v. Copeland, 64 Tex. 354.

And where, in an action for slander, the plea of not guilty is filed, together with pleas of justification, the plaintiff must prove the speaking of the words alleged, and the pleas cannot be used to convict the defendant, as he will not be bound to make his defense until he is proved guilty. Farnan v. Childs, 66 Ill. 547; Sumner v. Shipman, 65 N. C. 623; Ricket v. Stanley, 6 Blackf. 109; Wheeler v. Robb, 1 Blackf. 330, 12 Am. Dec. 245.

So, the rule under Ky. Code, § 151, providing that in cases for slander and libel the defendant may allege both the truth of the matter charged as defamatory and any mitigating circumstances legally admissible in evidence to reduce the damages, and whether he proves the justification or not he may give in evidence the mitigating circumstances, is that the defendant may, if he chooses, deny the speaking of the defamatory matter charged, and in a second paragraph admit the publication and allege its truth, and in still another he may admit the words, and, without alleging them to be true or admitting that they were false, justify by alleging such facts as are relied upon to excuse the publication. Harper v. Harper, 10 Bush, 447.

And a defendant in an action for slander may, under the New York Code, deny the speaking of the alleged slanderous words, and allege that the words were spoken under such circumstances and with such explanations describing them that they were not slanderous. Hollenbeck v. Clow, 9 How. Pr. 289.

Mitigating circumstances may be pleaded in an action for libel or slander in connection with a general denial, and with or without a plea of justification. Dolevin v. Wilder, 7 Robt. 319.

So, while, previous to the amendment of the New York Code in 1852, a plea of justification in an action for slander admitting and justifying the speaking of the words, was inconsistent with a previous denial, it is no longer necessary to make the admissions in a plea of justification, and the pleas are no longer inconsistent, as by N. Y. Code, § 140, providing that all the forms of pleading heretofore existing are abolished, and hereafter the forms of pleading in civil actions in courts of record and rules by which the sufficiency of the pleading is to be determined, are those prescribed by that act, the rule limiting the defendant to consistent answers, and requiring him to confess the speaking of the words if he justified in an action for slander, was abolished. Stiles v. Comstock, 9 How. Pr. 48.

And a defendant in an action for slander under New York Code, § 165, authorizing the defendant in such actions to allege both the truth of the matter charged as defamatory and mitigating circumstances to reduce the amount of damages, and prove the mitigating circumstances whether he proves the justification or not, may allege in his answer the truth of the charge in justification, and also facts tending to prove its truth in mitigation of damages, and is entitled to have evidence given thereunder submitted to the jury in mitigation of damages, though it fails to prove the justification. Bisbey v. Shaw, 12 N. Y. 67.

And he may deny any or all of the allegations of the plaintiff, and then by a separate statement of the same answer allege the truth of the statements contained in the libelous publication; and he may also, as a third defense, allege that the publication was privileged; but he cannot in the same defense deny the allegations of the plaintiff, and set up new matter to avoid their effect. Buddington v. Davis, 6 How. Pr. 401.

And a denial by the defendant in an action for slander that he had any recollection or belief of having spoken the alleged words, and an allegation that if he did speak them the charge was true, are not inconsistent. Butler v. Wentworth, 9 How. Pr. 282.

So, the general bad character of the plaintiff in an action for slander may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages under the plea of not guilty, though the defendant also pleaded a justification of the truth of the words and gave evidence in support of that plea, where it would have been proper to put in such evidence if there had been no other plea than that of not guilty. Hamer v. McFarlin, 4 Denio, 509.

And an answer in an action for slander in charging plaintiff with keeping a house of ill fame may, under N. Y. Code Proc. § 165, as amended in 1849, providing that in actions for libel and slander the defendant may in his answer allege both the truth of the matter charged as defamatory and any mitigating circumstances to reduce the amount of damages, deny the statements in the complaint, and also allege as a partial defense lewd and lascivious conduct on the part of the plaintiff's family, though it does not amount to a justification of the charge, and evidence of such conduct is admissible thereunder to reduce the amount of damages. Bush v. Prosser, 11 N. Y. 347.

So, under the Utah system of pleading, permitting the defendant with leave of court to plead as many several matters as he shall think necessary for his defense, a plea of justification by the defendant in an action for libel does not admit the publication of the libel and utterance of the slanderous words, where the answer also contains a general denial, and should not be received as evidence of such publication, and does not supersede the necessity of the plaintiff's proving his declaration. Murphy v. Carter, 1 Utah, 17.

In Kentucky, however, a defendant in a slander case may be compelled to elect between a denial of speaking the slanderous words and an averment of their truth. Lane v. Bryant, 100 Ky. 138, 36 L. R. A. 709, 37 S. W. 584.

But an answer admitting the publication of slanderous words and alleging their truth cannot be put in evidence against a defendant in a slander suit after the right to make that defense has been lost by electing to rely on a denial when compelled to make an election between the defenses. Ibid.

In the above case it was said that the case of Harper v. Harper, 10 Bush, 447, supra, is no longer the law.

So, in Missouri, formerly, a defendant in an action for slander had to confess the matters stated in the petition, and avoid them or traverse it; and he could not deny the words spoken and set up a justification; and where he did so he was held to the defense of the general denial, and no evidence was permitted to be given on the subject of justification. Coble v. McDaniel, 33 Mo. 383.

A verified answer in justification of a charge for slander admitted the speaking of the slanderous words, and the defendant in an action for slander could not deny and justify the speaking of the words at the same time, as the two defenses were inconsistent. Atteberry v. Powell, 29 Mo. 429, 77 Am. Dec. 579.

Under the Missouri Code, however, the defendant in an action for slander may in his answer deny the speaking of the words alleged, and also justify, the denial and the justification not being inconsistent, as proof of the one does not disprove the other. And there is no inconsistency between a general denial in an action for slander and facts pleaded in mitigation. Wood v. Hilbish, 23 Mo. App. 389.

8. Miscellaneous actions.

A denial in an answer in an action to recover moneys alleged to have been wagered on horse races, that the plaintiff had as alleged lost the amount sued for through the defendant, and an averment that at the time and in the transaction mentioned in the petition the defendants had lost through the plaintiff the amount for which judgment is asked in a counterclaim, are not inconsistent under Ky. Civ. Code, § 113, providing that a pleading may contain statements of as many causes of action, matters of estoppel and avoidance, and as many traverses as there may be grounds for in behalf of the pleader, provided the pleading does not contain inconsistent statements. Elias v. Gill, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 798, 18 S. W. 454.

And an allegation in an answer in an action to recover money alleged to have been deposited with the defendant, made on information and belief that if any such certificate of deposit as in the complaint is alleged was ever issued the same has been paid, is an allegation of payment, and is not inconsistent with another allegation in the answer that the defendant had no personal knowledge and no information sufficient to form a belief, and therefore denied that the deposit was made as stated in the complaint. Doran v. Dinsmore, 20 How. Pr. 504; Doran v. Dinsmore, 33 Barb. 88.

So, allegations in an answer in an action brought to recover money alleged to have been paid on account of a subscription to stock of a corporation, admitting the organization of the company and denying each and every other allegation, and, by way of further answer, alleging that the money sought to be recovered was not paid on account of the par value of the stock, but pursuant to an agreement whereby the plaintiff with other promoters of the company agreed to pay on the call of the treasurer a sum equal to 3 per cent of the amount of his subscription to the capital stock, which was to be used as a promoter's fund to meet the expenses of the organization, and that the same was used for that purpose, though they might be construed as inconsistent, are not under the New York Code subject to objection on that account. MacColl v. American Union L. Ins. Co. 89 Hun, 400, 35 N. Y. Supp. 384.

But an allegation in an answer in an action brought by an administrator to recover moneys alleged to be in defendant's hands belonging to the estate, that the whole sum deposited by the deceased was paid to the administrator, which was afterwards deposited with him as bailee of the administrator, is entirely inconsistent with another allegation therein that the defendant held the money as bailee of the deceased, and had paid it out on various orders of the administrator; and the defendant will be required to elect between them. Smith v. Culligan, 74 Mo. 389.

So, an allegation in an answer in an action on an account that the plaintiff and defendant met with three of their neighbors and made a settlement of all matters between them up to the date of the commencement of the action, is so inconsistent with another allegation that there were then existing unsettled differences between them that could form a set-off or counterclaim, as to warrant requiring the defendant to elect upon which he will rely. Ferguson v. Prince, 2 Kan. App. 7, 41 Pac. 988.

And an answer in an action for an accounting between partners in which the plaintiff alleged a loan of money to the firm, which first denies the allegations of the complaint and then admits them, and alleges that the loans were paid, is inconsistent, and admits the making of the loans, and amounts to no more than an affirmative allegation of payment. Rodgers v. Clement, 162 N. Y. 422, 56 N. E. 901.

And an allegation in an answer setting up a partnership account between the parties, and alleging a balance due the defendant, and praying for an account, and another in the same answer alleging that the whole partnership account is barred by the statute of limitations, are so inconsistent as to warrant requiring the defendant to elect upon which allegation he will stand, and strike the other from the record. Auld v. Butcher, 2 Kan. 136.

But where the general issue is pleaded in an action against persons alleged to be partners, together with an additional plea denying the partnership, it is error to strike out the plea denying the alleged partnership. Rowland v. Dalton, 36 Miss. 702.

So, an incumbent of an office, whose demurrer to a complaint disputing his title thereto has been sustained by the trial court, is not debarred from setting up, by way of answer, a different claim of title to the office than the one already considered, in case of the reversal and remanding of the cause by the supreme court, if he in good faith believes he has a different title, and has not yet addressed an answer to the complaint. State ex rel. Worrell v. Peelle, 124 Ind. 515, 8 L. R. A. 228, 24 N. E. 440.

But a plea in an answer in an action against an officer of a corporation for failure to file reports expressly admitting that the corporation was a corporation organized under the laws of the state is inconsistent with a subsequent allegation in the same answer denying that the corporation had any corporate existence within the state, because it was organized to do all its business without the state, and the latter allegation may be stricken out on motion. Tabor v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 27 U. S. App. 111, 62 Fed. Rep. 383, 10 C. C. A. 429.

So, a judgment in a prior action may be set up by way of estoppel in bar with the general issue in the same answer, as they are not inconsistent or incompatible pleas. Shafer v. Stonebraker, 4 Gill & J. 354.

And an answer denying the existence of the original judgment sued on, sought to be revived as pleaded, and admitting its existence and averring satisfaction thereof in a separate plea, is not subject to demurrer for repugnancy under a statute permitting a defendant to plead as many matters of fact in several pleas as he may deem necessary for his defense. Tucker v. Edwards, 7 Colo. 209, 3 Pac. 233.

In Ketcham v. Zerega, 1 E. D. Smith, 553, an answer in an action on a judgment denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the recovery of the judgment, and denying that the judgment if so recovered still stands in full force and effect and in no way satisfied or annulled, was sustained; but the objection seems to have been that the pleading was hypothetical, and not that it was inconsistent.

For another particular action not included in the above subdivisions as to particular actions, see Merchants' Nat. Bank v. McNaughton, 1 Abb. N. C. 293, note, infra, VII. b, 1.

VII. Effect of inconsistency as a waiver or admission.

a. The prevailing rule.

The rule adopted by the great weight of authority, and in nearly if not all the states except Minnesota, Missouri, Wisconsin, Kansas, and Louisiana, is that pleas must be construed separately and distinctly, except when connected by a reference to each other, and the plaintiff on the trial of an issue on one plea in an answer cannot take advantage of an inconsistent averment or admission contained in another plea. Clements v. Cribbs, 19 Ala. 241; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Whitley, 77 Tex. 126, 13 S. W. 853; Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 629; Swift v. Kingsley, 24 Barb. 541.

And that an allegation in one plea cannot be insisted upon by the adversary as an admission of a fact for a purpose distinct from the proof of the issue upon that plea, as every issue is to be distinctly tried. Morris v. Henderson, 37 Miss. 492; Heinrichs v. Terrell, 65 Iowa, 25, 21 N. W. 171; Express Printing Co. v. Copeland, 64 Tex. 354; Siter v. Jewett, 33 Cal. 92.

Thus, an admission in an answer in the nature of a confession and avoidance does not operate to admit matters formerly denied in other counts of the answer. Treadway v. Cedar Falls & S. City R. Co. 40 Iowa, 526; Quigley v. Merritt, 11 Iowa, 147; Harrington v. Macmorris, 5 Taunt. 233, 1 Marsh. 33.

And the rule is the same where the admission is contained in a notice of set-off as it is when it is contained in the answer itself. Harrington v. Macmorris, 5 Taunt. 233, 1 Marsh. 33.

And the burden of proof still remains with the plaintiff. Quigley v. Merritt, 11 Iowa, 147.

The pleading on which a party goes to trial is the one by the admissions of which he is bound; he is not bound by admissions made in a former pleading superseded by the pleading upon which he goes to trial by amendment, where such admissions are not contained in the amended pleading. Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154.

So, pleading one defense cannot be deemed a waiver of another in the same answer, though inconsistent. Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 871; Billings v. Drew, 52 Cal. 565; Miles v. Woodward, 115 Cal. 308, 46 Pac. 1076, 47 Pac. 360; Noonan v. Bradley, 9 Wall. 304, 19 L. ed. 757.

And an averment in a cross-complaint, though inconsistent with a denial in an answer, cannot be used to destroy its effect. Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 352, 50 Pac. 662; Nye v. Spencer, 41 Me. 272; Buhne v. Corbett, 43 Cal. 204.

And a denial in an answer is not waived or overcome by such an averment of substantially the same facts as those which the answer denies. Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 352, 50 Pac. 662.

A defendant in an action, having pleaded the general issue, is entitled to a trial thereon, and special pleas in justification of the acts complained of by the plaintiff are not a waiver of that right. Nye v. Spencer, 41 Me. 272.

And are not evidence against the party pleading them upon issues tendered in other defenses contained in the same answer consisting of denials only. McDonald v. Southern California R. Co. 101 Cal. 206, 35 Pac. 643, 646, dictum; Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 39.

And one plea cannot be given in evidence to sustain another, or to sustain the allegations in the declaration. Farnan v. Childs, 63 Ill. 547; Duncan v. Magette, 25 Tex. 245.

So, the statements in a special plea held bad on demurrer are not evidence for the plaintiff on the general issue, though the jury are to assess the damages as well as try the case on the general issue. Montgomery v. Richardson, 5 Car. & P. 247; Firmin v. Crucifix, 5 Car. & P. 97.

And judgment cannot be rendered on the pleadings where the material allegations of the complaint are denied in the answer, even though the answer sets up a special defense separately stated, which admits the allegations formerly denied. Botto v. Vandamenc, 87 Cal. 832, 7 Pac. 753; Amador County v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526.

And the fact that two defenses are inconsistent would not justify the court in denying the defendants the benefit of both defenses by returning a verdict for the plaintiff without consideration of any part of the defense. Kilue v. Hanke, 14 Mont. 361, 36 Pac. 454.

Nor is the mere fact that the materiality of one of them can only appear by assuming that the other is false, enough to deprive the defendant of the right to set up both. Mott v. Burnett, 2 E. D. Smith, 50.

While the plea in one action may in certain cases be conclusive evidence in another, it cannot be used as evidence on another issue on the same record. Knight v. M'Douall, 12 Ad. & El. 438, 4 Perry & D. 168, 4 Jur. 939.

Thus, a reply by a plaintiff in an action on a promissory note in which a set-off is interposed by the defendant denying the indebtedness charged generally and specifically is not waived by another count alleging payment of the set-off, and it remains incumbent upon the defendant to prove his set-off. Shannon v. Pearson, 10 Iowa, 588.

And an answer in an action by an indorsee of a promissory note that the note was given without consideration, and also that the plaintiff advanced a designated sum and no more upon the security of the note, and that such sum had been paid, amounts to an admission as to the sum alleged to have been advanced only. Robins v. Maldstone, 7 Jur. 694, 12 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 321, 4 Q. B. 811, Dav. & M. 80.

And where, in an action for rent, the defendant pleads non tenore and also tender of rent for a portion of the alleged term for which rent is claimed, and the defendant makes proof of tender in support of the latter plea, the plea of tender, and the evidence, taken together, do not amount to an admission of the tenancy, and is not evidence for the plaintiff of the tenancy as alleged, where nothing was said at the time of the tender about the terms of the holding or the time when rent became due. Knight v. M'Douall, 12 Ad. & El. 438, 4 Perry & D. 168, 4 Jur. 939.

So, a denial in an action for a wrongful discharge under a contract for services, of the wrongful discharge, and an allegation that the plaintiff was not discharged but quit voluntarily, do not preclude the defendant from setting up any other defenses or contesting the demand upon other grounds, or prevent him from denying that the plaintiff rendered good or satisfactory services. Koll v. Bush, 6 Colo. App. 294, 40 Pac. 570.

But a denial in an action for compensation for services rendered that any sum was due the plaintiff from the defendant pursuant to the contract for services or otherwise will be treated as a denial only that any sum of money was due under the contract, where the answer does not deny that a valid contract was entered into, but merely sets up a written contract which is not materially different from the one stated in the complaint, except that the work was to be paid for by a conveyance of land, and in effect admitting the value of the work to be performed, and that it had not been satisfied by a transfer of land or otherwise; and the plaintiff can rest upon the contract set up and the admissions made by the defendant. Schmid v. Busch, 97 Cal. 187, 31 Pac. 893.

So, setting up title in himself by a defendant in an action to recover possession of goods alleged to have been fraudulently sold does not waive the right of the defendant to insist upon the absence of proof of demand and refusal to give up the goods. Goodwin v. Wertheimer, 39 N. Y. 149, 1 N. E. 404.

And judgment should not be rendered on motion on an allegation in an answer in an action for the claim and delivery of personal property denying the plaintiff's title and the wrongful withholding, and averring that the goods are the property of the defendants, setting up also as a distinct answer an averment in the nature of a counter statement, rather than a confession and avoidance. Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 39.

So, an admission of possession contained in a special defense in an answer in an action of ejectment must be confined to that defense, where the answer also contains a general denial, putting in issue all the material averments of the complaint; and this is so irrespective of the question whether the matters contained in that plea could or could not have been proved under the general denial. Miller v. Chandler, 59 Cal. 540.

And where the defendant in an action for the recovery of land pleads a general denial, and also sets up a claim for improvements made on the premises, the plaintiff will not be permitted to put the second plea in evidence to prove possession of the premises in the defendant, as it is incumbent on the plaintiff to establish that upon the plea of the general issue. Morris v. Henderson, 37 Miss. 492.

And where, in an action for trespass, defendant files a general denial, and later files a further answer admitting the trespass but pleading in justification, the words "admitting the trespass," in the answer, are to be taken only as expressing the legal effect of the justification, and as independent of the plea of denial, and as not dispensing with the necessity of the plaintiff's first making out his case. Grash v. Sater, 6 Iowa, 302.

It is always competent for defendant, in trespass, to put the plaintiff on proof of his title under the general issue, however many special defenses he may set forth on the record; and the special pleas have no effect as admissions by way of estoppel with relation to any facts averred or admitted in them, as to the rights of the parties in the trial, unless the issues upon such special pleas become subjects of litigation, and then they estop only as admissions that operate to preclude proof in contradiction of the averment, or to dispense with proof of what is admitted by the pleadings. They in no manner operate as estoppels outside of the purpose of the principal issue taken upon such pleas themselves. Child v. Allen, 33 Vt. 476.

So, the effect of a general denial in an action to foreclose a mortgage is not destroyed by a separate plea on the part of the defendant setting up title in himself, as such defense does not expressly admit the deraignment of title in the plaintiff. Siter v. Jewett, 33 Cal. 92.

And judgment will not be rendered in an action for the breach of an official bond, on an allegation in the answer therein that the principal in the bond kept the public money in question in a safe in the room provided for that purpose, and that the safe was broken into and the money stolen, where it also contained a denial, separately stated, of all the allegations in the complaint. Amador County v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526.

And in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Macnaughton, 1 Abb. N. C. 293, note, it was held that a defense consisting of a denial that the plaintiffs were a corporation will not be stricken out, and cannot be deemed frivolous merely because another defense charges that the defendant had dealt with them.

So, a plea in an action for damages for a collision with a horse and carriage by a person riding a bicycle, that at the time of the collision the horse and wagon were not under the control of the defendant, but were in charge of an independent contractor, is not superseded by another allegation that the horse and wagon were at the time owned by the defendant, and were being driven by him along the highway, and that the accident occurred from the negligence of the plaintiff, and not through any fault of the defendant, or of his servants and employees, so as to warrant the trial of the case upon the theory that the driver must have been the servant of the defendants. Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935.

In the above case, Boil v. Brown, 22 Cal. 678, supra, II., was explained, the court saying that the language in that case relied on is correct when applied to the averments of any single separate defense, but is not applicable to the whole of an answer which contains different, distinct, and separate defenses.

See also, on the question of the operation of one plea as an admission as against another, cases from other parts of this note cited infra at the end of VII. b.

b. Exceptions to the rule.

The courts of a number of the states, notably Minnesota, Missouri, Wisconsin, Kansas, and Louisiana, have adopted an apparently contrary rule allowing pleas containing admissions to operate as a waiver or admission as against other pleas less favorable to the plaintiff.

Thus, the statutory rule that a defendant may plead as many defenses and counterclaims as he has, although they may be based on inconsistent legal theories, does not affect the principle that an admission in an answer will not be affected by a repugnant denial in another part of the same answer. South Milwaukee Boulevard Heights Co. v. Harte, 95 Wis. 592, 70 N. W. 821.

And it is not affected by the fact that the fact admitted was stated by way of confession and avoidance. Dickson v. Cole, 34 Wis. 626.

Where allegations are made by a defendant in his answer which are against himself, and which limit, modify, or overturn other allegations inconsistent therewith which are in favor of himself, he is bound by the allegations against himself. Bierer v. Fretz, 32 Kan. 330, 4 Pac. 284; Mitchell v. Ripley, 5 Kan. App. 818, 49 Pac. 153.

A general denial is always qualified or limited by any admissions or inconsistent allegations in the pleading. Hannem v. Pence, 40 Minn. 127, 41 N. W. 557; Rhinehart v. Whitehead, 64 Wis. 47, 24 N. W. 401; Nagel v. Mignot, 8 Mart. (La.) 488; Vavasaur v. Bayon, 11 Mart. (La.) 641; Dean v. Jackson, 1 Mart. N. S. 127.

If a fact be expressly admitted in any part of an answer, such fact is to be taken as true against the defendant, and the plaintiff is relieved from the necessity of proving it, though it may be controverted in some other part of the answer. Dickson v. Cole, 34 Wis. 626; Hartwell v. Page, 14 Wis. 52; Wiley v. Keokuk, 6 Kan. 94.

Whenever a defendant admits anything in his answer it will be presumed that the admission is intended to modify and control anything else that may be found in the answer in apparent conflict therewith. Butler v. Kaulback, 8 Kan. 671.

And where an answer in an action constitutes a mere denial of the plaintiff's right, and does not indicate the character of the defense if inconsistencies exist therein, the rule against inconsistent defenses should be applied to the admission of evidence. Fugate v. Pierce, 49 Mo. 441.

Thus, an answer containing a general denial, and also an averment that the instrument sued upon was made without consideration and in bad faith, admits the making of the assignments. Barnum v. Kennedy, 21 Kan. 181; Nagel v. Mignot, 8 Mart. (La.) 495.

And rigid rules requiring proof of the loss of the instrument by a fortuitous event would be dispensed with. Nagel v. Mignot, 8 Mart. (La.) 493.

And where a general denial and an allegation of performance of the contract in question are united in the same answer, the former will be disregarded. Nagel v. Mignot, 8 Mart. (La.) 488; Vavasaur v. Bayon, 11 Mart. (La.) 641; Dean v. Jackson, 1 Mart. N. S. 127.

So, a plea of the general issue in an action for a money demand is waived by plea of payment or satisfaction. Judice v. Brent, 6 Mart. N. S. 226; M'Micken v. Brent, 6 Mart. N. S. 249; Bryans v. Duneth, 1 Mart. N. S. 412; Davis v. Millaudon, 17 La. Ann. 97, 87 Am. Dec. 517.

And the inconsistency is not avoided by the defendant's declaration that he did not intend to waive the benefit of the latter plea. Davis v. Millaudon, 17 La. Ann. 97, 87 Am. Dec. 517.

And an averment by the defendant in an action on a note that the obligation has been discharged, dispenses with proof of its execution, though the answer also contained a general denial. Naba v. Carlin, 3 Mart. N. S. 373.

So, a plea denying all and singular the allegations contained in the plaintiff's petition, and another plea alleging that the contract was a synallagmatic one, and two copies of it were not made according to law, are inconsistent so that evidence to establish the execution of the instrument is unnecessary. Ferguson v. Thomas, 3 Mart. N. S. 75.

And an answer in an action to recover upon a lost note averring that the defendant did not make any such note as that described in the petition, but that he did execute a note to plaintiff which by its description is the same described in the petition, with the additional description that it was made payable at a certain place and contained a stipulation that the plaintiff was not to trade it off, alleging that he had done so, admits the execution of the note sued upon. Kinman v. Cannefax, 34 Mo. 147.

So, an allegation in an answer in an action on an administrator's bond that the sureties were discharged in consequence of the gross negligence of the plaintiff necessarily admits the liability of the defendant if negligence is not shown and is a waiver of an allegation therein that the name of one of the sureties was signed thereto without authority, and that a third person was substituted for another who did not sign the bond though his name was inserted in the body of it. McNamara v. Jarvis, 2 La. Ann. 591.

And a general denial by insurance companies of knowledge of the acts of their agents in forming a combination to maintain rates in violation of a statute is not sufficient to raise an issue on that question, when the special defenses in the answer amount to a practical admission of such violation and challenge the constitutionality of the statute. State, Crow, v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. 152 Mo. 1, 45 L. R. A. 363, 52 S. W. 595.

And admissions in an answer in an action of ejectment may be availed of by the plaintiff though in another part the answer contained a general denial. Farrell v. Hennesy, 21 Wis. 633.

And an admission in an answer in such an action of title in the grantor of the plaintiff, previous to the date of his deed, may be availed of by the plaintiff though the answer contained also a general denial. Orton v. Noonan, 19 Wis. 351; Sexton v. Rhames, 13 Wis. 99.

And a general denial of plaintiff's title to land in controversy in an action for the recovery of its possession is overcome by a special answer admitting the right of the plaintiff by showing the circumstances under which the defendant entered. Miller v. Larson, 17 Wis. 624.

So, an admission in an action of ejectment that the plaintiff was the original owner of the property in controversy, and that the defendant held under him, operates as a modification of a general denial contained in the same answer, and relieves the plaintiff from the necessity of offering evidence to prove his title, and makes it incumbent upon the defendant to show that something had transpired whereby he had succeeded to the rights of the plaintiff. Butler v. Kaulback, 8 Kan. 671.

A defendant in an action of ejectment may plead a general denial, and also in the same answer swear an equitable defense, and rely on that as an independent defense, but he should frame his pleading so as to show that he relies upon both defenses; if he unqualifiedly and absolutely pleads title or right to the possession out of himself and in the plaintiff but for the equities, the plaintiff should not be required to offer any evidence, especially if he waives damages, rents, and profits. Ledbetter v. Ledbetter, 88 Mo. 62.

So, under a general denial in an action for damages done to plaintiff's land in constructing a railroad over it, and a plea of confession and avoidance, the confession will be taken as true, and under it the plaintiff will be entitled to a verdict of some damages unless the defendant proved the matter of avoidance; but in such case the plaintiff will not, upon the mere admissions contained in the pleadings, be entitled to recover more than nominal damages, unless the pleading in terms admits the damages which the plaintiff claims, or some other damages. McCord v. Doniphan Branch R. Co. 21 Mo. App. 92.

And a plea of the statute of limitations in an action for the enforcement of a vendor's contract security for the purchase money of land, sold by him, which would go to rescind the contract and leave the title in the plaintiff, is waived by a plea in the same answer of payment, and a refusal on the part of the vendor to deliver a deed, concluding with a prayer for general relief which would be equivalent to a prayer for compelling the vendor to complete the contract. Adair v. Adair, 78 Mo. 630.

And an express averment in an answer in an action for the recovery of an alleged surplus in the hands of the defendant arising from lands, a mortgage upon which had been transferred to him to secure a debt, that he purchased the land in his own right and for his own use, relieves the plaintiff of the necessity of proving that fact in the first instance, notwithstanding the fact that the answer further averred that he did so because the plaintiff had theretofore released to him the claim on the notes and mortgage or the proceeds thereof. Dickson v. Cole, 34 Wis. 621.

As to effect of inconsistent plea as an admission, see also Clarke v. Lyon County, 7 Nev. 75, supra, VI. c. 1; Lamberton v. Shannon, 13 Wash. 404, 43 Pac. 336; *Maxwell v. R. 440, supra, II; Chew v. Close, 9 Phila. 211, supra, IV. a.

As to waiver of one plea by inserting another inconsistent one, see also Shelby County v. Bickford, 102 Tenn. 395, 52 S. W. 772; Weiden v. Texas Continental Meat Co. 65 Tex. 487; Lewis v. Acker, 11 How. Pr. 163; Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Frick, 29 Ohio St. 466; Michael v. Mutual Ins. Co. 10 La. Ann. 737, supra, VI. a, 1; *Andrews v. ward Heights Co. v. Harte, 95 Wia. 592, 70 N. W. 821, supra, VI. c. 6.

c. Explanation of the apparent conflict.

It is to be noted that in nearly if not all of the cases set forth supra, VII. b, the inconsistency was of fact and not by implication of law, and the admissions were formal and explicit, and it is thought that the true rule, at least outside of the five states there mentioned, and probably in them also, is that a less favorable defense can be treated as an admission or as a waiver of a more favorable one when and only when the inconsistency is one of fact and the admission was formal and explicit and might have been avoided, but that it cannot be so treated when the admission is by implication of law or is unavoidable in order to present all the defenses which the party was entitled to make.

Thus, a defendant pleading several pleas in his answer will not, under the Wyoming statute, be concluded from proving the truth of one plea by any implied admission contained in another, or by any implication of law arising therefrom. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Warren, 3 Wyo. 134, 6 Pac. 724.

In the above case, the rulings of the supreme courts of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Kansas were explained and distinguished, the court saying that the admissions in one plea which those courts have held conclusive against the defendant as against another plea were express.

So, where a defendant pleads specially, not as a defense, but solely with the view to having affirmative relief against a plaintiff, notice of which purpose the latter has from the pleading itself, the special plea does not cut off the defendant's right to rely on the general issue. Morris v. Housley (Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 659.

And an admission by a defendant in his answer that he executed the instrument set forth in the complaint cannot be relied upon by the defendant as proof of such execution, where in another portion of the answer all the material allegations of the complaint had been denied, and the admission was a mere confession for the purpose of avoidance, as the plaintiff cannot dismember a special plea and take the confession as a general admission in the suit. Troy & R. R. Co. v. Kerr, 17 Barb. 581.

So, where the law authorizes a defendant to plead several pleas he may use each plea in his defense, and the admissions unavoidably contained in one cannot be used against him in another. Glenn v. Sumner, 132 U. S. 152, 33 L. ed. 301, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41; Whitaker v. Freeman, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 271.

But a clear and explicit admission in one defense in an answer of an allegation of a complaint denied in another defense in the same answer is available to the plaintiff, and relieves him from the necessity of proving the allegations in his complaint so admitted, when the admission was not unavoidable to him for the purpose of presenting the defense in which the admission was made. McLaughlin v. Alexander, 2 S. Dak. 226, 49 N. W. 99.

In the above case it was said that in a proper case it may be a serious question whether an exception should not be made as suggested by Mr. Justice Gray in Glenn v. Sumner, 132 U. S. 152, 33 L. ed. 301, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41, supra, as to an admission not unavoidably made in order to entitle a party to properly present a defense.

So, while an admission in one plea cannot be used to prove or disprove another plea, where it appears from the whole conduct of a cause that a particular fact is admitted between the parties, the jury may draw the same conclusion as to that fact as if it had been proved in evidence. Stracy v. Blake, 1 Mea. & W. 168, Tyrw. & G. 528.

And while special pleas of defendant are not admissible in evidence to prove facts therein alleged where a general denial is interposed, facts admitted in the pleading and not denied in other pleas are established against the party, though their construction and effect are for the court. Bauman v. Chambers, 91 Tex. 108, 41 S. W. 471.

And defenses which are inconsistent to the extent of being untrue are not sufficient to put the plaintiff upon proof. Allen v. Olympia Light & P. Co. 13 Wash. 307, 43 Pac. 55. And see SEATTLE NAT. BANK V. JONES.

A party who formally and explicitly admits by his pleading that which establishes the plaintiff's right will not be suffered to deny its existence or to prove any state of facts inconsistent with that admission, though in his answer he also denied any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to a fact material to the plaintiff's case. Page v. Willet, 38 N. Y. 28; Willet v. Metropolitan Ins. Co. 2 Bosw. 678; Myrick v. Bill, 3 Dak. 284, 17 N. W. 268; Baird v. Morford, 29 Iowa, 531.

And the rule is the same where one of the counts is by way of answer and defense to the allegations in the petition, and the other by way of the cross-demand. Baird v. Morford, 29 Iowa, 531.

And the general denial will be stricken out on motion, unless so amended as not to deny the allegations afterwards admitted. Willet v. Metropolitan Ins. Co. 2 Bosw. 678.

But the technical rule which supposes that special defenses confess and avoid when in fact they do not confess at all should not be adopted in determining the consistency or inconsistency of defenses. McAdow v. Ross, 53 Mo. 199; Nelson v. Brodhack, 44 Mo. 596, 100 Am. Dec. 328.

And a positive denial in an action for assault and battery is not waived by a subsequent plea of justification in the same answer. Rhine v. Montgomery, 50 Mo. 566.

And a general denial by the plaintiff in reply to an answer alleging the alteration of the instrument sued on and a plea of ratification of an agreement for an extension of time and of the alteration set up in the answer, if they admit the making of the agreement and of the alteration as set up in the answer, do not admit the validity and legal effect of such agreement and alteration, and are not therefore inconsistent. Moore v. Macon Sav. Bank, 22 Mo. App. 684.

So, a plea of no consideration for an assignment of a promissory note to the plaintiff is nullified by an admission in the same answer that the note was given for town lots, and that the plaintiff succeeded to the rights, properties, and liabilities of his assignor. Ryan v. Middleborough Town-Lands Co. (Ky.) 52 S. W. 33.

And a plea of not guilty in a statutory action in the nature of ejectment admits possession of the defendant and denies plaintiff's right thereto, and a disclaimer denies that the defendant was in possession when the action was brought, and therefore a plea of not guilty is incompatible with the disclaimer, and the two cannot be pleaded together, and the former will be deemed a waiver of the latter. Bernstein v. Humes, 60 Ala. 582, 31 Am. Rep. 52; McQueen v. Lampley, 74 Ala. 408.

But a plea in trespass to try title by virtue of a conveyance of land by the defendant, that the land was defendant's homestead when the conveyance was made, presents no defense, and will not stand the test of a general demurrer, and therefore will not operate to prevent the defendant from showing under his plea of not guilty that the conveyance was in fact a mortgage and void because given on a homestead. Wiggins v. Wiggins, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 335, 40 S. W. 643.

VIII. Inconsistency, how taken advantage of.

While inconsistency between defenses may be taken advantage of by treating the least favorable one as an admission and as nullifying the more favorable ones where the inconsistency is of fact, it is also frequently taken advantage of by a motion to require the pleader to elect upon which defenses he will rely, by motion to strike out one of the defenses and by demurrer.

The fact that two defenses in an answer are inconsistent does not, at least unless they are inconsistent in fact, authorize the plaintiff to disregard them or either of them at the trial.

If he desires to present the question he should move to strike out the one or the other, or apply for an order compelling the defendant to elect as to which particular defense he will rely on. Buhne v. Corbett, 43 Cal. 264; Spencer v. Tooker, 12 Abb. Pr. 353.

He is not entitled to judgment on the pleadings because several defenses set up in the answer are inconsistent with each other. Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 Pac. 753.

The appropriate and most usual course is to require the pleader to elect upon which defense he will rely. Munn v. Taulman, 1 Kan. 254, 81 Am. Dec. 508; Dunn v. Bozarth (Neb.) 80 N. W. 811; Lynch v. Richter, 10 Wash. 486, 39 Pac. 125; Noonan v. Bradley, 9 Wall. 394, 19 L. ed. 757.

And see Conway v. Wharton, 13 Minn. 158, Gil. 145, infra; Arnold v. Dimon, 4 Sandf. 680, supra, IV. a.

And where a defendant sets up separate and distinct defenses in his answer which are inconsistent with each other, the court should require him to elect upon which of the defenses he will rely, and the evidence upon the trial should be confined to the defense upon which he elects to stand. Ferguson v. Prince, 2 Kan. App. 7, 41 Pac. 988.

He should be allowed to elect between them, and to amend by striking out the defense which he discards, and the allowance of such an amendment does not prejudice the rights of the plaintiff or furnish him with grounds for appeal. Breunich v. Weselman, 100 N. Y. 609, 2 N. E. 885.

And where a defendant is required to elect between two inconsistent defenses, and the record states that he elected to stand upon the first one, but it appears that the issue tendered in the second defense was in fact the real issue tried, the court on appeal will treat the case as involving the issue made by the second defense only. Smith v. Culligan, 74 Mo. 389.

As a general rule an objection that an answer presents inconsistent defenses is waived by a failure to move to require the defendant to elect upon which he will rely. Dunn v. Bozarth (Neb.) 80 N. W. 811; Lynch v. Richter, 10 Wash. 486, 39 Pac. 125.

And in such case the plaintiff cannot take advantage of such defect by way of request for instructions. Lynch v. Richter, 10 Wash. 486, 39 Pac. 125.

Requiring a defendant to elect between two defenses which are not inconsistent, however, is prejudicial error. Grier Commission Co. v. Dockstader, 47 Mo. App. 42.

See also, as to requiring the pleader to elect, Parks v. McClellan, 44 N. J. L. 552; Riley v. Riley, 20 N. J. L. 114; LeConte v. Pendleton, 1 Johns Cas. 104; Trotter v. Mills, 6 Wend. 512, —supra, IV. 3; Societa Italiana Di Beneficenza v. Sulzer, 138 N. Y. 468, 34 N. E. 193, supra, VI. a; Bell v. Brown, 22 Cal. 671, supra, VI. b, 1; Kelly v. Bernheimer, 3 Thomp. & C. 140; Springer v. Dwyer, 50 N. Y. 19; Cook v. Finch, 19 Minn. 407, Gil. 350; Bird & M. Map Co. v. Jones, 27 Kan. 177; Black v. Holloway, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 694, 41 S. W. 576, —supra, VI. c, 1; Lawrence v. Peck, 3 S. Dak. 645, 54 N. W. 808; Pavey v. Pavey, 30 Ohio St. 600; Patrick v. Boonville Gaslight Co. 17 Mo. App. 465; Shed v. Augustine, 14 Kan. 282; Brann v. Brann, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 1814, 44 S. W. 424, —supra, VI. c, 2; Grier Commission Co. v. Dockstader, 47 Mo. App. 42, supra, VI. c, 3; Willson v. Cleaveland, 30 Cal. 195; Keane v. Kyne, 2 Mo. App. 317; Hooven & A. Co. v. National Cordage Co. 27 Ohio L. J. 18, —supra, VI. c, 6; Horton v. Banner, 6 Bush, 596; Ormsby v. Douglass, 2 Abb. Pr. 407, 5 Duer, 665; Lane v. Bryant, 100 Ky. 138, 36 L. R. A. 709, 37 S. W. 584, —supra, VI. c, 7; Smith v. Culligan, 74 Mo. 389; Ferguson v. Prince, 2 Kan. App. 7, 41 Pac. 988; Auld v. Butcher, 2 Kan. 136, —supra, VI. c, 8.

In a number of the courts, however, motions to strike out one of the inconsistent defenses have been sustained, notwithstanding the fact that such a course deprives the pleader of the right to elect upon which he will rely.

Thus, under the rules prescribed by the circuit court in South Carolina the proper method of objection to inconsistent defenses is by motion to strike one of the inconsistent defenses from the record. It should be made before trial. Cohrs v. Fraser, 5 S. C. N. S. 351.

And the same rule obtains in Alabama. Cleveland v. Chandler, 8 Stew. (Ala.) 489.

And in California if inconsistent defenses are set up the defect may be reached by motion to strike out one of them. Urdias v. Morrell, 25 Cal. 31; Klink v. Cohen, 13 Cal. 623.

Or in some cases by demurrer. Klink v. Cohen, 13 Cal. 623.

And in Iowa an objection that a set-off is pleaded with a general denial in an answer where they are in a clearly defined and distinct division thereof should be taken by demurrer or motion to strike out, and cannot be taken after issue is joined by a replication. Pike v. King, 16 Iowa, 49.

Error in refusing to strike out inconsistent pleas in a reply to affirmative matter in an answer, however, is cured by the action of the court in disregarding that portion of the reply, and trying the case upon the theory that it was entirely irrelevant and immaterial. Davis v. Ford, 15 Wash. 107, 45 Pac. 739, 46 Pac. 393.

And where an answer in an action for recovery for services alleged to have been rendered alleging that when defendant heard of the employment of the plaintiff it discharged him and offered to pay him what his services were worth, also contains a general denial, the defendant is not prejudiced by an order striking out all but the general denial, as all the evidence which could have been received thereunder is admissible under the general denial. People's Nat. Bank v. Gelsthardt, 55 Neb. 232, 75 N. W. 582.

So, striking out a plea in an answer on the ground that it is inconsistent with another plea therein is not reversible error though erroneous, where no evidence was rejected on account of its absence, and the defendant litigated every question of fact so far and as fully as it could have done if the pleading had remained. Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 355, 21 L. ed. 170.

The Minnesota statute does not in terms authorize a defense to be stricken out for inconsistency, and in most cases in which one defense is inconsistent with another the better practice would be to require the court to compel the defendant to elect upon which defense he will stand rather than to strike it out. Conway v. Wharton, 13 Minn. 158, Gil. 145.

As to striking out pleas as inconsistent or contradictory, see also Lay v. Filmore, 75 Miss. 493, 23 So. 184; Marx v. Gross, 26 Jones & S. 221, 9 N. Y. Supp. 719; Wright v. Card, 16 R. I. 719, 19 Atl. 709.—supra, VI. c. 1; Shepard v. Starrett, 35 Mo. 367, supra, VI. c. 2; Kellogg v. Baker, 15 Abb. Pr. 286, supra, VI. c. 4; Dunfield v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 5 Colo. App. 25, 36 Pac. 622, supra, VI. c. 5; Newsom v. Guy, 109 Ala. 305, 19 So. 448, supra, VI. c. 6; Rowland v. Dalton, 36 Miss. 702; Tabor v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 27 U. S. App. 111, 62 Fed. Rep. 383, 10 C. C. A. 429.—supra, VI. c. 8. And see Willet v. Metropolitan Ins. Co. 2 Bosw. 673, supra, VII. b. 1.

The question whether or not inconsistency between different defenses in an answer may be reached by demurrer seems to depend upon the language of the statute providing for demurrer and prescribing the grounds therefor.

Thus, in Indiana it has been held that a plea which contains repugnant allegations respecting material matter is bad on general demurrer, as the contradictory averments destroy each other. Barber v. Summers, 5 Blackf. 339.

And a demurrer has been held proper in other courts. See Klink v. Cohen, 13 Cal. 623; Pike v. King, 16 Iowa, 49, supra.

And in Furniss v. Ellis, 2 Brock. 14, Fed. Cas. No. 5,162, it was held that where in an action of assumpsit the defendant both pleads the general issue and demurs, and the plaintiff takes issue on the plea but refuses to join in the demurrer, it amounts to a discontinuance under the Virginia statute authorizing the court to nonsuit the plaintiff, as pleading the general issue with the demurrer amounts to pleading double, but is not a positive inconsistency.

Upon the other hand, however, it has been held that repugnancy in an answer is matter of form and cannot be noticed on general demurrer. Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188; Munn v. Taulman, 1 Kan. 258, 81 Am. Dec. 508.

And that a demurrer cannot reach the order of pleading by the defendant if a plea in abatement and a plea in bar be pleaded together. Cleveland v. Chandler, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 489.

So, an objection that an answer contains inconsistent allegations and denials cannot be made by demurrer, where the grounds upon which a party may demur are specified and enumerated in the statute and such objection is not included; and when such objection exists in such case it should be taken advantage of by motion to strike out, or to require the party pleading to elect between the inconsistent pleas. Caldwell v. Ruddy, 2 Idaho, 5, 1 Pac. 339.

And a demurrer to an answer containing a general denial, and also matter specially pleaded, is too broad, unless in the special pleas there is an express or implied admission of all the material allegations of the petition. In the absence of such admission the demurrer should go to the new matter alone. State ex rel. Davis v. Rogers, 70 Mo. 286.

for mere inconsistency, indefiniteness, or repugnancy, if some fact or facts are averred positively, and the indefiniteness, inconsistency, or repugnancy is not such as to render the averment meaningless. Second Nat. Bank v. Hart, 8 Ind. App. 19, 35 N. E. 302.

As to demurrer for repugnance, see also Second Nat. Bank v. Hart, 8 Ind. App. 19, 35 N. E. 302, supra, VI. b. 2; Wright v. Card, 16 R. I. 719, 19 Atl. 709; Bernays v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 45 Fed. Rep. 455.—supra, VI. c. 1; Strouse v. Lelpf, 101 Ala. 433, 23 L. R. A. 622, 14 So. 667, supra, VI. c. 4; Scranton v. Rosarge (Miss.) 19 So. 194, supra, VI. c. 6; Martin v. Woods, 6 Mass. 6; William v. Harris, 2 How. (Miss.) 627; Byas v. Wylie, 1 Comp. M. & R. 686, 3 Dowl. P. C. 524, 5 Tyrw. 377, 1 Gale, 50; Robins v. Crutchley, 2 Wils. 118; Barber v. Summers, 5 Blackf. 339.—supra, IV. a.

The proper mode of interposing the objection that a defense set up in an amended answer is inconsistent with the defense in the original answer is by appealing from the order permitting the defense to be made. Bruce v. Burr, 67 N. Y. 237.

It is not the province of the judge to order a correction of errors or removal of defects in pleas consisting of inconsistencies between the pleas in an answer, upon its own motion, though on application he may permit it to be done; and it is error for the court, upon its own motion, to declare defenses inconsistent and contradictory and direct the defendant to elect upon which he will rely. Ten Broeck v. Orchard, 78 N. C. 518.

If inconsistent defenses are set up in an answer, advantage must be taken of it by motion or demurrer; otherwise the defect is waived; and at the trial a party may rely upon both defenses. Conway v. Clinton, 1 Utah, 215; Urias v. Morrell, 25 Cal. 31.

Or he may, as under the old system of pleading, rely on the matter of his last defense unaffected by the statements in a prior, separate, and distinct defense. Klink v. Cohen, 13 Cal. 623.

Repugnancy between pleas in an answer is ground for not receiving them, and if they have been received it is too late to object to them on that ground. Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188, dictum.

And objection to inconsistency of pleas in an answer cannot be made for the first time in the appellate court on appeal. Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Barton, 38 Ill. App. 469.

When the court rules that two defenses in an answer are inconsistent, the defendant is at liberty to stand upon an exception taken to the ruling, and need not antagonize the court by insisting further on its right to establish both defenses, and will not be prejudiced by a failure to offer evidence bearing upon the one stricken out. Conklin v. Woodbury Dermatological Inst. 37 App. Div. 610, 56 N. Y. Supp. 258.

And going to trial upon an issue made by a plea in an answer is not a waiver of exception to the ruling of the court striking out another plea for repugnancy. Tucker v. Edwards, 7 Colo. 209, 3 Pac. 233.

Overruling an exception to an answer in an action of trespass to try title, pleading a general denial and not guilty, and also containing a plea in reconviction, if erroneous, is not prejudicial error where no evidence was offered under the plea. Koenigheim v. Miles, 67 Tex. 116, 2 S. W. 81.

The circuit courts of the United States are governed, on the question of the sufficiency and scope of pleading with reference to consistency and repugnancy in actions at law, by the practice of the courts in the state in which they are held. Glenn v. Sumner, 132 U. S. 152, 33 L. ed. 301, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 41.

IX. Conclusion.

This is a practice question, and one in which radical changes have been made by statute at different times. This, with a conservative tendency upon the part of the courts to import the principles of the old procedure into the new after a change, has given rise to apparently radical conflicts of authority, and it has been repeatedly held under the same system of pleading and without apparent qualification, upon the one hand, that a defendant may set up all the defenses he may have, whether consistent or inconsistent, and, upon the other hand, that he may set up all the defenses he may have provided they are not inconsistent. Comparing these apparently conflicting cases, however, unqualified as they are, with rules laid down in some of the most carefully considered cases, as to what is inconsistency, and as to different kinds of inconsistency, and as to the test of inconsistency which will vitiate a pleading, will show, it is thought, that the rule that there are two kinds of inconsistency,—inconsistency of fact consisting of absolute contradiction in matters of fact, and inconsistency by implication of law consisting of an incompatibility arising from the union of denials and admissions by implication of law for the purpose of avoidance,—and that all inconsistency is permissible, at least in equity and under reform procedure, except absolute inconsistency of fact of such a character that if one statement be true another must be false. Even the Missouri cases under a statute permitting only consistent pleas, and those of the other states holding that pleas must be consistent, with the possible exception of those of Louisiana, are reconciled by this rule, those cases having defined the prohibited inconsistency to be inconsistency of fact. And this theory also reconciles the apparent conflict of authority as to what inconsistency will act as an admission, and dispense with proof of the admitted facts, as the rule under both classes of cases would be that to have this effect the inconsistency would have to be one of fact, such that if the admission were true the denial must be false.

While absolute inconsistency in fact in a pleading may be treated as establishing the facts alleged in it most favorable to the opposite party, inconsistency may also be taken advantage of by motion to compel the pleader to elect between the inconsistent pleas, by motion to strike out, and by demurrer, motion to compel an election appearing to be the favored method.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

Thomas C. HINDMAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF LOUIS-

(98 Fed. Rep. 562.)

A false certificate by the cashier of a bank, stating that an insurance company had on deposit subject to check certain amounts of paid-up capital and net surplus, made to assist the company to obtain a license and authorized by the board of directors, who knew it to be false, and the publication of the same statement in the public press, to which the bank was privy, for the purpose of securing a large bank deposit and of selling stock held by the bank as collateral, render the bank liable for deceit to a person who bought worthless stock of the insurance company in reliance on this statement.

(November 13, 1899.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to hold it liable for losses incurred by plaintiff in purchasing stock of an insurance company upon representations made by defendant. Reversed.

Before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Ricks, District Judge.

NOTE.—As to right to rely on published statements by banks, see Gerner v. Mosher (Neb.) 46 L. R. A. 244.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

This is a writ of error brought to review the judgment of the circuit court of Kentucky sustaining the demurrer to the reformed and amended petition of Thomas C. Hindman against the First National Bank of Louisville and others seeking to recover damages for loss sustained by the plaintiff in the purchase of eighty shares of the capital stock of the Columbian Fire Insurance Company, which purchase was induced, the petition alleges, by certain fraudulent misrepresentations of the bank and other defendants. The petition originally was ordered by the court to be reformed. A demurrer was filed to the reformed petition, and was sustained. The plaintiff then asked leave to amend, which was granted. The amendment was filed, and a new demurrer filed. This was sustained, and judgment entered for the defendant. (C. C.) 86 Fed. Rep. 1013. The reformed petition makes parties defendant the First National Bank of Louisville, C. B. Sullivan, A. W. Hart, and James S. Ray. Ray is made a defendant simply as receiver of the Columbian Insurance Company, and not as a party to the transactions charged against the other defendants. The petition, after setting up the necessary jurisdictional facts as to the diverse citizenship of the plaintiff and defendants, avers that in January, 1893, certain persons duly organized the Columbian Fire Insurance Company under the laws of Kentucky, and applied to the insurance commissioner of that state to do business as such therein, with a capital of $200,000 and a surplus of $50,000; that the commissioner entered upon an investigation of the affairs of the company; that the incorporators falsely represented that the capital had been paid in full, and that in addition the company had $48,000 surplus in cash, free from debts and liabilities, and that the whole sum of $248,182.90 was on deposit in the First National Bank of Louisville, and subject to check; that the commissioner applied to the bank for confirmation of this statement; that the board of directors of the bank, knowing the object of the inquiry, caused the bank cashier to make a sworn certificate to the insurance commissioner that the insurance company had on deposit $248,000 of capital paid in and net surplus; that the statement was untrue, and was made for the fraudulent purpose of enabling the insurance company to deceive the commissioner and secure a license to do business, when it was not lawfully entitled to one; that it was done in pursuance of a conspiracy between the bank and the officers of the insurance company, C. B. Sullivan, A. W. Hart, and others; that, to give the false appearance of such a deposit as was certified, the insurance company and the bank pretended to make certain discounts of promissory notes of notoriously insolvent persons, each of which had been given, as the bank knew, in payment of the maker's subscription to the stock of the insurance company; that the bank had gone through the form of discounting the notes on the indorsement or guaranty of the insurance company, and of placing the proceeds to the credit of the latter on the bank's books; that many of the said notes were not discounted in good faith; that the proceeds thereof were never intended to be, and were never in fact, subject to checks of the insurance company, and the bank had at all times retained a lien on the fund thus apparently standing to the credit of the insurance company. The petition proceeds:

"Plaintiff says that the said First National Bank united with said insurance company and other named defendants, except Ray, in this said fraud, for the purpose of obtaining the benefit that would result to it from having said insurance company keep a large deposit with said bank; it having been previously agreed and understood between said bank and said insurance company that the latter would, if licensed to do business, keep a large amount of cash on deposit with said bank at all times. Plaintiff says that in compliance with this agreement said insurance company did thereafter at all times during its existence keep a large amount of cash on deposit in said bank, which deposit was of great value and benefit to said bank. Plaintiff says that said insurance company, having in the fraudulent manner herein recited, obtained license to do business in Kentucky and in other states, commenced at once to engage in the fire-insurance business throughout the various states in which it was licensed. Plaintiff says that said defendants, except Ray, further represented to the plaintiff and to the public, by publications, that the said company had said cash capital and surplus amounting to $248,182.90, which publications were made in the public prints and scattered over the country, and which were seen and relied upon by plaintiff, and falsely represented that there were no mortgages upon the same or liens upon the same, and that the stock had been paid for at $125 a share, and that the company was organized and ready for business, and made representations to the effect that the said company was a bona fide company, with a sound capital, properly organized; and plaintiff alleges that all the parties named in the caption hereof co-operated with said insurance company and said bank and the officers thereof, and the other defendants except Ray, in setting said company on foot, and publishing that said cash capital and surplus of $250,000 had been paid up in cash, bona fide, in accordance with said representation. . . . And this plaintiff alleges that by the representations and publications of the defendants, and by the issue of the said statement by said bank to the said Duncan, and the licensing of said company by said Duncan, insurance commissioner, he was deceived, . . . and while deceived by the false representations and deceit and false and fraudulent conspiracy of said defendants in setting on foot and floating said company, and while ignorant of the fraud practised upon him and the public, and when he believed the representations and publications aforesaid to be true, and the false and fraudulent insurance company to be a bona fide and genuine insurance company, properly licensed, purchased on February 6, 1893, eighty shares of the capital stock of the said Columbian Fire Insurance Company of America at the price of $125 a share, making a total of $10,000, . . . all of which said shares were paid for in cash by said plaintiff, and were issued to him on the 6th day of February, 1893.

"Plaintiff says that it was the purpose of all the said defendants, except Ray, to put stock of said insurance company on the market to be sold, to make up said capital stock, which was short, as hereinbefore alleged, and that the defendants A. W. Hart and C. B. Sullivan, representing themselves and the said other defendants, and acting in collusion with all the other defendants, except Ray, represented to the plaintiff that the said stock thus sold to him had been paid for, bona fide, in cash by the original subscriber therefor, which representation was false, and known to them and the other defendants to be false, and that said original certificates would be taken up, and new certificates issued in lieu thereof to the plaintiff; and plaintiff alleges that, as a matter of fact, the shares of stock which were so canceled, and in place of which the certificates filed herewith were issued to him, were shares of stock which had been originally issued to C. B. Sullivan, and for which he had subscribed and not paid, and which had never been paid for by him or any person whomsoever, and alleges that said stock which was thus sold to him was a part of the stock used as collateral in the pretended discounting of notes, by which, on the guaranty or indorsement of the insurance company, money was placed to the credit of said insurance company, to make up the fictitious capital thereof, by the First National Bank, and said bank participated in said frauds, and got the benefit of said payment made by said plaintiff for his stock. All of the defendants, except Ray, knew of the shortage in said capital stock, and fraudulently conspired and contrived the setting on foot of the said insurance company, and the selling of said stock to this plaintiff; and plaintiff alleges that said stock, at the time of the sale to him, and at all times during the existence of the company, was absolutely worthless, and known to be so by all said defendants, who knew that said company started in said fraudulent manner, and was unsound. Plaintiff alleges that said company continued in business as a fire insurance company for about fourteen months, but by reason of its not having its capital stock as aforesaid, and of the aforesaid shortage in its capital stock, it was forced to make an assignment on February 27, 1894, and did so assign, and became and was at all times from its inception insolvent, and the stock was and is absolutely worthless."

By amendment to the petition, plaintiff further averred as follows:

"Plaintiff alleges that it was a part of the plan and design of said defendants, among whom was said bank, to have said stock put in the name of parties who did not intend in good faith to take the same, and this was the case with the said stock of C. B. Sullivan, which was sold to plaintiff; and the purpose of so doing was to put off upon plaintiff and sell to him the stock in the said fraudulent insurance company, the said Hindman, plaintiff, to pay cash therefor, and under said plan the said plaintiff was in reality the first allottee of said stock; the said C. B. Sullivan, as plaintiff alleges, being in league with and co-operating with the said bank and other defendants to so sell stock which he had never intended to pay for himself, and to put on foot said insurance company without the alleged capital and surplus, and without the capital paid in as required by law, and knowing that the same had not been paid in. Wherefore plaintiff prays as heretofore, and for all proper relief."

Judge Barr, who presided in the circuit court, sustained the demurrer on the ground that the misrepresentations set forth were addressed to the original allottees of the stock, and not to the plaintiff, who was a purchaser from an original allottee; following in this the authority of the case of Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 378.

Messrs. Barnett, Miller, & Barnett, A. M. Rutledge, and W. W. Thum, for plaintiff in error:

A similar petition seems to have been approved in the case of Murray v. McGarigle, 69 Wis. 483. 34 N. W. 522.

To organize an insurance stock company by the giving of notes, which are discounted, and the proceeds of which are placed to the credit of the insurance company, the company remaining contingently bound, is absolutely unlawful under the Kentucky statutes.

To induce persons to take stock in such a scheme by representing that a bona fide corporation has been formed, and that it has its capital and surplus paid up in money, and is in all respects in accordance with the laws of the state, is a fraud. For several persons to co-operate in maintaining such an enterprise is a conspiracy. For some of the persons to make representations by prospectuses or by verbal statements directly to the taker or buyer of stock, and for the others, either corporations or individuals, to forward the scheme by making false representations to the insurance commissioner, and thereby to secure a license for a bubble company, so that it can be launched and begin business, is to make the second parties responsible for the acts and declarations of the first, and to make all parties liable in damages for injury inflicted upon one who subscribes for or buys stock previously or subsequently in the bubble company thus brought into existence, launched, and made to operate as though it were a real company.

One party uniting in the common object may not be present when the fraudulent representations are made to the buyer of stock; may not know that they are actually made; yet if the buyer has been induced thereby to take the stock, and that one party be united in a common effort, and perform and act in consummation of the fraud, either previously or subsequently, he is equally guilty and equally liable.

A corporation, and a national bank, like other corporations, is liable in tort for the frauds of its officers; invariably liable when those frauds are within the scope of the general business of the bank; and also liable when those frauds, being outside the general business of the bank, are yet such as the bank enables its officers to commit, and authorizes and ratifies.

The act of the bank in making a false and fraudulent return and sworn certificate to the insurance commissioner was a part of the scheme to consummate the conspiracy and fraud by which the plaintiff lost his money; and it would have been liable even if the plaintiff had subscribed for the stock and put up his money and been deceived by the representations of the other conspirators before December 31, 1892, and before the making of the affidavit of the cashier of the bank to the insurance commissioner.

If the cashier's act gives existence to the bogus company, those persons who have acted upon the declaration of any of the conspirators, who have joined in the unlawful purpose, are injured by the act of the bank whether they subscribed for their stock either prior or subsequently thereto; for there would have been no such company but for such action, and there would have been no resulting loss; and all parties participating in the scheme are equally guilty.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The so-called reformed petition and its amendment are inartificially drawn, and are full of redundancy and evidential averments, but we think that they state with sufficient clearness the following case: Several of the defendants other than the bank organized a fire insurance company under the laws of Kentucky. Before the company could do business under the laws of Kentucky, it was necessary for it to procure a license from the state insurance commissioner. The license could only issue upon proof that the capital ($200,000) of the insurance company had been paid in in cash. But a little over $100,000 of the capital had been paid in cash and deposited in the defendant bank. To make up the needed remainder, the defendant bank accepted notes of various subscribers to the stock for the amount of their respective subscriptions, with the stock pledged as collateral therefor. The notes were indorsed by the insurance company. Though the proceeds of the notes were credited to the latter on the books of the bank, the amount of them was not, according to the understanding between the bank and the insurance company, subject to check. In order to start the insurance company in business, and thereby secure for itself a large deposit account, and for the further purpose of selling the stock of the insurance company pledged to it as collateral, the defendant bank, through its board of directors, assisted the insurance company to obtain a license by directing its 48 L. R. A.

cashier to certify to the insurance commissioner that the insurance company had on deposit with it, subject to check, $200,000 paid-up capital and $48,000 net surplus. The license was issued upon the faith of this certificate. In further pursuance of its purposes the defendant bank united with the other defendants in procuring the publication in newspapers of general circulation in Kentucky and elsewhere of statements similar to those contained in the cashier's affidavit. The plaintiff, induced by such publications and by the statements in the cashier's affidavit, and relying thereon, bought eighty shares of the stock of the insurance company, which the bank then held as collateral security for a note of one of the defendants given for his stock subscription. Plaintiff paid $10,000 for the stock. The stock was worthless when he bought it, and has never been worth anything since. The insurance company, owing to the fact that it never had the amount of capital required by law, became wholly insolvent, and was wound up under the laws of Kentucky. The statement of the cashier was plainly false, and known to be so by the bank, for it clearly implied that the capital and surplus were in cash over and above all liabilities.

The argument of counsel for the defendant in error is: First. That the statement of the cashier, in so far as it certified that the insurance company's deposit was for capital and net surplus, was ultra vires, and could not be made ground for holding the bank for deceit. Second. It is contended that neither the cashier's affidavit nor the newspaper publications were addressed to the plaintiff, and he had no right to rely on them; that the former was directed to the insurance commissioner only, and the latter to the possible subscribers to the stock, and not to one who, like the plaintiff, bought stock already issued.

First, it is to be observed that the question here is not of the authority of the cashier, as was the case in First Nat. Bank v. Marshall & I. Bank, 54 U. S. App. 510, 83 Fed. Rep. 725, 28 C. C. A. 42. The petition specifically avers that the certificate was made by order of the board of directors. This was the governing body of the bank, and although, of course, in a certain sense, it is an agency or representative of the bank, it is for all practical purposes the bank. Goodspeed v. East Haddam Bank, 22 Conn. 530, 540, 541, 58 Am. Dec. 439; Burrill v. Nahant Bank, 2 Met. 163, 35 Am. Dec. 395; Bank Comrs. v. Bank of Buffalo, 6 Paige, 502; Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7, 12, 26 L. ed. 998, 1000; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 114, 37 L. ed. 97, 103, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597, 610, 30 L. ed. 1146, 1148, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1286. The question here, therefore, is whether a national bank can make itself liable in an action for deceit by causing a knowingly false statement to be made concerning the financial condition of one of its customers. In England it is said that a corporation may be held liable for the commission of any wrongful act within the scope of its incorporation. Green v. London General Omnibus Co. 7 C. B. N. S. 290; Edwards v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 287; Clerk & L. Torts, 49. By this is meant, not that the charter must specifically authorize the wrongful act, but only that it must be committed by the corporation in pursuance of a power lawfully conferred, though wrongfully and tortiously exercised. The same view is taken by Mr. Justice Campbell, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202, 16 L. ed. 73, as follows: "The result of the cases is, that for acts done by the agents of a corporation, either in contractu or in delicto, in the course of its business and of their employment, the corporation is responsible, as an individual is responsible under similar circumstances."

The limits of a corporation's liability for a wrong are somewhat less strictly laid down in later cases in our supreme court. In First Nat. Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 702, 25 L. ed. 750, 751, Mr. Justice Swayne, speaking for the Supreme Court, said: "Corporations are liable for every wrong they commit, and in such cases the doctrine of ultra vires has no application. . . . An action may be maintained against a corporation for its malicious or negligent torts, however foreign they may be to the object of its creation, or beyond its granted powers. It may be sued for assault and battery, for fraud and deceit, for false imprisonment, for malicious prosecution, for nuisance, and for libel."

In Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256, 260, 30 L. ed. 176, 177, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1055, Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, said:

"The truth is that with the great increase in corporations in very recent times, and in their extension to nearly all the business transactions of life, it has been found necessary to hold them responsible for acts not strictly within their corporate powers, but done in their corporate name, and by corporation officers who were competent to exercise all the corporate powers. When such acts are not founded on contract, but are arbitrary exercises of power, in the nature of torts, or are quasi criminal, the corporation may be held to a pecuniary responsibility for them to the party injured."

The latest expression of the court on this subject is found in Washington Gaslight Co. v. Lanston, 172 U. S. 534, 544, 43 L. ed. 543, 547, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 296, in which it is said: "The result of the authorities is, as we think, that, in order to hold a corporation liable for the torts of any of its agents, the act in question must be performed in the course and within the scope of the agent's employment in the business of the principal. The corporation can be held responsible for acts which are not strictly within the corporate powers, but which were assumed to be performed for the corporation and by the corporate agents who were competent to employ the corporate powers actually exercised."

It is not necessary for us to consider or discuss the difference, if any, between these 48 L. R. A.

measures of corporate liability for torts, because we think that the case made by the petition is within the most conservative of them. It is also a part of a bank's business to sell at as high a price as may be the collateral held by it to secure its bills receivable. If the bank, in order to increase its deposits or to sell its collateral, makes or causes to be made false statements concerning the financial condition of one of its customers and depositors to a third person, for the purpose of misleading that person to his injury, we think the bank is liable in deceit if loss ensues. The relation of a bank to its depositors and customers is one which gives it exceptional opportunity to acquire most reliable information of their business and financial affairs. It is a common practice for the cashier of one bank to apply to the cashier of another to learn the financial standing of customers of the latter bank, or, indeed, of any person doing business in the city of the latter bank. When the answers made are not made for the benefit or in the business of the second bank, but are merely matters of courtesy between the two cashiers, the second bank is not responsible for their inaccuracy or falsity. This was found to be the state of the case in First Nat. Bank v. Marshall & I. Bank, 54 U. S. App. 610, 83 Fed. Rep. 725, 28 C. C. A. 42. But the ratio decidendi of that case was that if the false answer to the query had been made by the cashier, with the privity of the president, in the business and for the benefit of the bank, the bank would have been liable. It is the usual practice for depositors and customers of a bank to refer others to the bank for information as to their financial responsibility. To give such information to third persons or to the public at the instance of the customer or depositor is certainly not beyond the scope of banking powers. It is argued that, while the bank might properly certify to the amount on deposit to the credit of one of its depositors, it has no power to certify how much of the deposit is for capital and how much for net surplus. This is too refined. The bank's relation to the insurance company as a customer might very well enable it to learn with reasonable certainty how and for what purpose the money deposited had been paid in, and whether it was net capital or surplus, or was likely to be reduced by outstanding liabilities, and to give this information to whom it might concern, with the consent of the depositor. It certainly had the amplest knowledge of the fact that the insurance company was a large debtor of the bank,—so large as to make the statement that it had a paid-in cash capital and net surplus of $248,000 utterly false. If it made such a statement to the insurance commissioner to obtain a license, and was privy to the publication of the same statement in the public press, as is alleged, all for the purpose of securing a large bank deposit and of selling stock held by it as collateral, it seems to us that this was done in the course of the business of the bank, and was "within the scope of its incorporation." In Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, L. R. 2 Exch.

259, the action was for deceit against a bank. The plaintiff furnished feed to the horses of a government contractor, who was a customer and depositor of the bank, on the written assurance of the manager of the bank that if the plaintiff would do so the bank would pay him out of the first money received by the contractor from the government after the bank had satisfied any claim of its own. The bank then held a note of the contractor for £12,000, but the manager did not disclose this. The court held that the case should be left to the jury to say whether the manager had not given the plaintiff to understand that there was a probability that out of the government payment there would be enough to pay plaintiff, when he knew there was not. This case shows clearly that a bank's statement concerning the financial condition of its customer is an act within its corporate capacity, at least when made to further the business interests of the bank. The petition charges the bank, not only with falsely making the false statement to the insurance commissioner, but also with conspiring with the other defendants to repeat the statements to the public in the newspapers in furtherance of the two purposes already stated. It is now well settled that a corporation may be held for torts in which express malice or intent to defraud is a necessary element. Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, L. R. 2 Exch. 259; Goodspeed v. East Haddam Bank, 22 Conn. 530, 58 Am. Dec. 439; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202, 16 L. ed. 73; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 114, 37 L. ed. 97, 103, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597, 610, 30 L. ed. 1146, 1148, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1286. It is a necessary corollary from these cases that a corporation may be held for a conspiracy with others resulting in injury to a third person. The point is expressly adjudged by the court of appeals of New York in Buffalo Lubricating Oil Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 106 N. Y. 669, 12 N. E. 825; same case in supreme court, 42 Hun. 153. See also, to same effect, Moore v. Bricklayers' Union, No. 1, 23 Ohio L. J. 48, affirmed by supreme court of Ohio, without report, 31 Ohio L. J. 208; Dodge v. Bradstreet Co. 59 How. Pr. 104. If a bank may make a false statement concerning the financial condition of one of its customers for its own benefit, and may conspire with another to accomplish its business purposes, it follows that it may conspire with others to circulate the statement already made by it to deceive the public, and that any one of the public to whom the statement is addressed, and who acts upon it to his injury, may hold the bank for his loss.

The second ground urged in favor of the demurrer was that the statements concerning the financial condition of the insurance company were not addressed to the plaintiff, but only to the insurance commissioner, on the one hand, or to the probable subscribers to the stock of the insurance company, on the other. The plaintiff, it is said, was not the insurance commissioner, and was not a subscriber to the stock, but was a purchaser from an original subscriber. In the case of Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 377, one who, misled by false statements in a prospectus issued by the directors of an intended company, had bought shares therein from an original allottee and suffered severe losses, attempted to hold the directors for his injury. It was held that a prospectus was addressed to the original allottees; that when the allotment was completed the office of the prospectus was exhausted, and one purchasing from an original allottee could not rely on it and hold those issuing it for his loss. The case has not met with entire concurrence by the courts of this country. Dissent from its conclusion is based on the view that one issuing a prospectus or statement calculated to mislead others to their injury ought to be charged with liability to any person or class of persons whose action on the faith of it he might reasonably and naturally anticipate, and that purchasers from original allottees are quite as likely to act on the prospectus as the allottees themselves. We do not find it necessary, however, to discuss the principles of Peek v. Gurney in deciding this case, for we think it clear that the averments of the petition make it unnecessary. The newspaper statements of the condition of the insurance company, repeated from the cashier's statement to the insurance commissioner, to all of which the bank is alleged to have been privy, were not issued or addressed to original subscribers to the stock. The petition and its amendment in effect aver that the original subscriptions were made by defendants and others engaged in promoting the company, and that the purpose of the company and the bank was not so much to secure original subscribers, as to sell the stock which had been pledged to the bank to secure payment of the original subscriptions, and which the bank was therefore especially interested in selling. The false statements are thus averred to have been made for the very purpose of reaching and influencing purchasers like the plaintiff, and Peek v. Gurney has no application. Even if it be conceded that the plaintiff had no right to rely on the certificate to the insurance commissioner, the repetition of the contents of the certificate in newspaper publications by the bank and others for the very purpose of misleading probable purchasers of the stock is quite sufficient to hold the bank and the other defendants.

A third objection to the sufficiency of the petition and its amendment is that it shows no damage to plaintiff, and fraud without damage gives no action. The contention is that the measure of the recovery in such a case is the difference between the price paid and the value of the stock when bought (Peek v. Derry, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 591), and that there is no averment in the petition that the stock was not worth what plaintiff paid for it when he bought it. For subsequent losses due to misfortune or mismanagement defendants cannot, it is said, be made responsible in this action. This objection must fail for the reason that the petition expressly alleges that the stock was worthless when plaintiff bought it.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, with directions to overrule the de-murrer to the reformed petition and its amendment, and to require the defendants to answer. The costs of the proceeding in error should be paid by defendants.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Thomas W. CORBETT, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Harry MATZ et al.

(.....Conn.....)

1. A finding of facts made after the end of the term at which judgment was rendered, when the court had no power to modify or change the judgment, and after the time for an appeal has expired without an appeal being taken, cannot be made by the court a part of the judgment nor of the record of judgment, nor the foundation of a writ of error to reverse the judgment, although there are statutory provisions (such as Gen. Stat. §§ 1107, 1111) to the effect that any party is entitled to have a finding of the facts on which judgment is founded appear on the record and become part of the judgment.
2. The special finding of facts provided for by Pub. Acts 1897, chap. 194, § 6, is not for the purpose of spreading those facts upon the records as part of the judgment, but is only to be made after judgment has been rendered, to become part of an appeal, and it cannot be made in the absence of an appeal and after the expiration of the time for taking one.
3. The sufficiency of facts found to support a judgment may be raised by writ of error, when the facts are made part of the record of the judgment.

ERROR to the City Court of New Haven to review a judgment foreclosing a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. B. Stoddard and J. P. Goodhart, for plaintiff in error:

The act of making a finding of facts by the court is a ministerial act, and not judicial.

Johnson v. Higgins, 53 Conn. 238, 1 Atl. 616.

By the statute, § 1111, the court is directed to make a record of their proceedings, and cause the facts on which they found their final judgment to appear of record and such finding, if requested by either party, shall specially set forth such facts.

There is no time fixed when such finding shall be made, and there is no statute of limitations applying to this case.

Taylor v. Gillette, 52 Conn. 218.

The finding of facts is often essential as a basis for a writ of error.

Clark, 45 Conn. 405, note; Selleck v. Rusco, 46 Conn. 370.

The statute, § 3087, provides that a writ of error may be brought within three years after the final judgment.

It would appear that at any time within the statutory limit a party desiring to bring a writ of error would be entitled to a finding of facts upon which to base his writ of error. Any other rule would deprive a person of his statutory three years' time in which to commence his action.

Johnson v. Higgins, 53 Conn. 236, 1 Atl. 616.

The practice has always been that the judge makes his finding after the term expires, and he can amend his finding at any time, even after the session of the supreme court has commenced.

Comstock's Appeal, 54 Conn. 119, 6 Atl. 196.

The supreme court can remand the case for a further finding.

Schlesinger v. Chapman, 52 Conn. 273.

Smith v. Moore, 38 Conn. 105; Taylor v. Gillette, 52 Conn. 216.

Messrs. E. P. Arvine, George E. Beers, and E. P. Arvine, Jr., for defendants in error:

A finding is a document which owes its origin and its effect entirely to statute.

Woolf v. Chalker, 31 Conn. 124, 81 Am. Dec. 175; Campbell v. Boyreau, 21 How. 223, 16 L. ed. 96.

The finding provided for by Pub. Acts 1897, chap. 194, is one filed in response to a written request made within a prescribed number of days after judgment and as a step in an appeal, and that this statute has no relation to this case.

The paper signed by Judge Dow can therefore be a part of the record only in case it comes within § 1111. The manifest object of § 1111 is to secure a judgment specific enough so that redress for errors may be had in the court above.

The general rules of practice in force when the judgment was entered (Rule XVII. § 5) expressly provide that the finding may be embraced in the judgment or decree.

Perkins v. Brazos, 66 Conn. 248, 33 Atl. 980; Thresher v. Dyer, 69 Conn. 409, 37 Atl. 979.

In the case at bar the facts upon which the decree rests were expressly found and recited in that decree as follows: "Upon due hearing of all the parties appearing, as on file, the court finds that all the allegations in the complaint are true, and that the sum of $5,222.91-100 is due from the defendants to the plaintiff on the day therein mentioned."

When the judge found these facts he exhausted his power under § 1111, and when that judgment file was signed, the record of the city court was made up.

It cannot be contradicted on a writ of error.

1 Swift, Digest, *791; Wetmore v. Plant, 5 Conn. 544; Burgess v. Tweedy, 16 Conn. 42.

Nor can the writ reach errors not appearing on the face of the record.

Gould, Pl. 5th ed. p. 542; Stephen, Pl. p. 144.

Any further alleged finding of fact was a bald attempt to modify the judgment, and comes within the general rules as to amending judgments. A judgment cannot be set aside or changed after the term in which it was granted has gone by.

In the absence of special rules, the request for a finding must be made during the trial.

McGacock v. Woodlief, 20 How. 221, 15 L. ed. 884.

The power of the judge was exhausted when the judgment was signed.

The finding, even if the court had authority to make it, is not part of the record.

The finding cannot be read as a bill of exceptions.

A bill of exceptions is "a statement in writing of the objection made by a party to his (the judge's) decision."

Hoey*, 36 Conn. 387.

Hall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error obtained a judgment of foreclosure in the city court of New Haven on the 20th of April, 1899, in an action in which the plaintiff in error appeared as a defendant, filed an answer, and was fully heard. The judgment file of that date, and in due form, states that the court found all the allegations of the complaint true. There was no continuance of the case for any purpose, and no further action taken upon it during that term. Under the city charter a new term of the court began on the first Monday of the following July. In the present writ of error brought to reverse that judgment the errors assigned are in effect that the facts found by the city court, and appearing upon the record of that court, are insufficient to support the judgment rendered, inasmuch as they show that the mortgage foreclosed was invalid because the debt which it secured was a conditional, and not an absolute, liability.

Writs of error upon matters of law reach only those errors which appear of record. As proof that the facts, which are alleged to be insufficient to support the judgment, appear upon the record, the plaintiff in error relies upon a finding of facts and an amendment thereto signed by the judge of the city court in the month of November following the date of the judgment, and directed by him to be made a part of the record.

If by such action of the trial judge the facts thus found are made part of the record of the judgment rendered at the previous term of the court, the question of the sufficiency of such facts to support the judgment may be raised by writ of error. Goodrich v. Stanley, 23 Conn. 79; Tolland v. Wilington, 26 Conn. 518; Seymour v. Belden, 28 Conn. 444. Section 3, p. 91, Court Rules (1899), says, if the facts required to be found under §§ 1107, 1111, of the General Statutes are insufficient to support the judgment, that constitutes an error apparent upon the record.

But if the facts thus found by the trial judge are not a part of the record of the trial court, the question of the validity of the mortgage which was the subject of the foreclosure suit cannot be considered in this proceeding, since it is not claimed that the judgment is erroneous without those facts, or that, in the absence of those facts, the record discloses that the trial court, by any ruling or decision, held that a mortgage given under the circumstances detailed in the finding was valid.

Apparently plaintiff's counsel rely upon the provisions of § 6 of chap. 194 of the Public Acts of 1897, as well as upon §§ 1107 and 1111 of the General Statutes, as authorizing the finding made in November, and as empowering the judge to add those facts to the record of the trial court.

But the provisions of § 6 of the Acts of 1897, requiring a judge to make a special finding of facts, and which are the same as those of § 4 of the Public Acts of 1882, have reference only to the preparation of a statement of facts to be made after judgment has been rendered, and to become a part of an appeal to this court. Such a finding is for the purpose of enabling the parties to present to this court by appeal the questions which were raised and decided in the trial court, and the judge is only required to make it at the request of the party giving notice of the appeal, which must be done within the time fixed by the statute.

This act makes no provision for a finding in the absence of an appeal and after the expiration of the time for taking one. Johnson v. Higgins, 53 Conn. 238, 1 Atl. 616; Thresher v. Dyer, 69 Conn. 409, 37 Atl. 979.

It was no part of the purpose of this statute to enable the parties to an action to have spread upon the records of the trial court, as a part of the judgment, the facts conclusively determined in the action between them, and a special finding merely for the purpose of an appeal does not have that effect. That object, as well as "the inclusion of such facts in the judgment for the purpose of presenting the question whether the judgment is the true voice of the law upon the facts found," is amply provided for by §§ 1107 and 1111 of the General Statutes. Kushman v. Parsons, 70 Conn. 295, 39 Atl. 179; Thresher v. Dyer, 69 Conn. 409, 37 Atl. 979.

We do not mean to say that a special finding of facts obtained for the purpose of an appeal may not, when the appeal is not pursued, be made the basis of a writ of error, when the finding is made a part of the judgment, by a court or judge having at the time control of its own judgment, and competent to erase or modify it. But such a finding becomes a part of the record of the trial court by force of § 1111, rather than of the act of 1897.

In this case, the plaintiff in error made no attempt to appeal to this court from the judgment of the city court, and, as the time for taking such an appeal had long since passed when the finding was made, it is not a finding provided for by the law of 1897. But if it could be so regarded it would avail the plaintiff nothing in this action if the facts so found are inconsistent with those contained in the judgment file. The judgment file is the only formal written statement which expresses the decision rendered. (Court Rules, 1899, §§ 94-96.) No allegation of the writ of error can be entertained which contradicts the record.

The judge of the city court after the expiration of the time for taking an appeal, and after the expiration of the term in which the judgment was rendered, had, therefore, no power to annul, modify, or supplement that judgment by incorporating in it, as its foundation, the facts set forth in the finding, unless he was authorized to do so by the provisions of §§ 1107 and 1111 of the General Statutes.

Section 10, chap. 13, of the Revision of 1875, p. 444, provided only that courts of equity should cause the facts upon which their decrees were founded to appear on the record. By § 30 of the practice act (Pub. Acts 1879) this was amended so as to read as in § 1111 of the General Statutes: "All courts shall keep a record of their proceedings and cause the facts on which they found their final judgments and decrees to appear on the record, and such finding, if requested by any party, shall specially set forth such facts." Section 197 of Rules of Court 1899, p. 55, provides that when all the material allegations put in issue are found for the plaintiff or defendant, the finding of the issues for the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, is "equivalent to a finding that all his material allegations which were put in issue" are true, and will be a sufficient compliance with Gen. Stat. § 1111, in the absence of a request for a special finding. The making of either a general or special finding of facts as the foundation of its judgment thus becomes a "duty thus cast upon the court to be discharged in every civil action, whether the judgment is or is not to be made the subject of appellate proceedings." Scholfield Gear & Pulley Co. v. Scholfield, 70 Conn. 500, 40 Atl. 182.

Section 3, p. 91, of Court Rules 1899, provides that the finding of facts required by §§ 1107 and 1111 of the General Statutes should ordinarily form part of the judgment file.

The finding intended by these provisions, whether it be general or special, is to become a part of the judgment of the trial court, that the parties may have spread upon the record the material facts within the issues, which have been finally determined, and that they may, if they desire, be enabled to present the question "whether the judgment is the true voice of the law" upon those facts. To comply with these requirements the finding of facts, made under § 1111, whether general or special, should either be incorporated in the judgment file, or should be made a part of it by reference contained in the judgment file itself, or should be expressly made a part of the judgment by the terms of the finding.

A finding thus made a part of the judgment may, as we have already said, become the basis of a writ of error, and it may also become the foundation for an appeal by one who, having complied with the conditions imposed by the statute of 1897, is, at the time the finding is made, entitled to an appeal. But a finding of facts made when no appeal has been taken, and after the right of appeal is gone, cannot become a part of the judgment, nor of the record of judgment, nor the foundation of a writ of error to reverse the judgment, unless the court or judge at the time of making it possessed the power to render the judgment of which it is to become a part, or to modify or change the judgment after it has been rendered.

The judge of the city court had no power under §§ 1107 and 1111 to make the facts set forth in the finding the foundation of the judgment which is sought to be reversed, because he had no control over that judgment when the finding was made. The case was finally disposed of by the judgment rendered on the 20th of April. The judgment file of that date expresses the intention of the judge "to perform thereby his final act in reference to the cause, and to embody therein his ultimate conclusion as to the law." While after that time he may have retained the power to modify the judgment or direct an amendment of the record, he possessed no such power after the expiration of the term in which the final judgment was rendered. The finding made by the judge in November of the next term of court is therefore not a record of the trial court.

In Sturdevant v. Stanton, 47 Conn. 579, a judge of the superior court by a writing filed in March, 1878, endeavored to correct or complete a judgment or the record of a judgment rendered at a previous term in June, 1877, and the only record of which appears to have been this memorandum of the judge, upon the files returned to the clerk: "Decree that respondent recover costs." This court held that the judgment of June, 1877, expressed by this memorandum, exhausted the power of the judge over the case after final adjournment. "We cannot," said the court by Pardee, J., "concede to him the power in March, 1878, to change that which he intended in June, 1877, should thereafter stand as his judgment."

In Hall v. Paine, 47 Conn. 429, the superior court ordered an irregular judgment in favor of the defendant rendered at a former term and duly recorded, erased, and, in the absence of the plaintiff, rendered a different judgment against him. Judge Loomis, in giving the opinion of this court upon a writ of error, said that "the inadequacy of the judgment . . . conferred no power on the court at the subsequent term either to supplement the first judgment by a new one or to erase and annul the judgment of the former term;" that the case was not pending in court at the latter term, and that the court "had no jurisdiction over the case at all."

The case of Taylor v. Gillette, 52 Conn. 216, does not conflict with the above conclusions. In that case a judge of probate was required to correct an appeal from the probate of a will, by describing the appellants as heirs at law of the testatrix instead of sisters. The court held that the judge of probate acted as his own clerk, and that he might, like any other clerk, be required to correct an erroneous record. We may add that that case further differs from the one at bar in the fact that the original case, namely, the settlement of the estate, was still pending in the probate court.

In the case before us the judgment file of April 20 contains a record of the facts upon which the judgment in question is founded, as is required by § 1111. The facts so found are sufficient to sustain the judgment, and the judgment is in no respect erroneous.

This case has been presented by counsel as if the only issue raised by the pleadings was one of law. The first defense was apparently intended to raise an issue of fact as to the existence of the alleged record of the city court. No proof has, however, been offered of the existence of any part of the alleged record, nor does even the alleged copy attached to the complaint as an exhibit appear to have been certified by the clerk of the city court. We have assumed, as counsel seem to have done, that the only question to be decided was whether, as a matter of law, the finding of facts in question is a record in the foreclosure suit.

There is no error.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

Walter H. STOUTENBURGH, Appt.,
v.

George FRAZIER.

(.....D. C.....)

1. A conviction and sentence on the charge of being "a suspicious person" under the act of Congress of July 8, 1898, applicable to the District of Columbia, when the suspicion of which the accused is the object is wholly undefined and in no manner connected with any criminal act or conduct, either past or that might occur in the future, are in violation of U. S. Const. Amendments 4 and 8, prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures and cruel and unusual punishments.
2. A person may be discharged on habeas corpus from a judgment and sentence under an act of Congress which is unconstitutional or so indefinite as to the offense charged as to be void and without effect.

NOTE.—As to when writ of habeas corpus may be used, see note to Bion's Appeal (Conn.) 11 L. R. A. 694.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of a Special Term of the Supreme Court discharging petitioner in habeas corpus proceedings from the custody of appellant to which he had been committed under a sentence of the Police Court. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Andrew B. Duvall, Clarence A. Brandenburg, and A. Leftwich Sinclair, for appellant:

The police court had jurisdiction of the person of the appellee and of the offense with which he was charged, and had full power and authority to impose the sentence which it did impose.

The only questions open and proper for consideration upon habeas corpus are: Had the court whose action is assailed jurisdiction of the party and of the offense charged against him? And had it power to impose the sentence which it did impose?

The writ of habeas corpus cannot be converted into a writ of error, and no retrial of issues of fact can be had to review the proceedings of a legal trial.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case is brought into this court from a judgment of one of the justices of the supreme court of this District, sitting in special term, rendered on habeas corpus, whereby the appellee was discharged from imprisonment, to which he had been committed in execution of a sentence of the police court of this District.

It appears that the appellee was arrested, charged with being a suspicious person, and was taken before the police court, and, upon information filed in that court he was tried and convicted, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $40. and in default of payment thereof to stand committed to the workhouse for the period of four months. Upon that conviction and sentence, he applied for the writ of habeas corpus, and upon return thereto, and hearing by the judge, the prisoner was discharged; and the intendant of the workhouse of the District, acting in behalf of the District, has taken this appeal.

By the information upon which the appellee was tried and convicted, a copy of which is filed with the petition for the writ of habeas corpus, the appellee was charged in the police court with being, on the 1st day of October, 1899, at and within the District of Columbia, and ever since that date, and still was, at the date of the filing of the information, a suspicious person in and about the streets, avenues, alleys, roads, and highways, to wit: Four-and-a-half street, southwest, contrary to and in violation of the act of Congress entitled "An Act to Amend an Act for the Preservation of the Public Peace and the Protection of Property in the District of Columbia," approved July 8, 1898.

By the return of the intendant of the workhouse to the writ of habeas corpus, it is stated, "that the petitioner, said George Frazier, was convicted in the police court of the District of Columbia on the 24th day of October, 1899, of the charge of being a suspicious character, contrary to and in violation of the act of Congress, approved July 8, 1893, entitled 'An Act to Amend,' " etc.

By the amendatory act of Congress referred to, approved July 8, 1898, the § 8 of the act of Congress of July 29, 1892, was stricken out and the following substituted in its place, viz.: "That all vagrants; all idle and disorderly persons; persons of evil life or evil fame; persons who have no visible means of support; persons repeatedly drunk in or about any of the streets, alleys, roads, highways, or other public places within the District of Columbia; persons repeatedly loitering in or around tippling houses; all suspicious persons; all public prostitutes; and all persons who lead a lewd or lascivious life, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not to exceed forty dollars, or shall be required to enter into security for their good behavior for a period of six months."

The arrest and conviction of the appellee appear to have been upon mere suspicion, and he is only charged with being a suspicious person without any relation whatever to crime committed in the past, or crime intended to be committed in the future. The suspicion of which he is the object is wholly undefined, and in no manner connected with any criminal act or conduct either of the past or that might occur in the future.

By whom the suspicion is to be entertained does not appear; whether it be by one policeman or by several, seems not to be regarded as material; or whether it be a suspicion entertained by one or more citizens is by no means certain. It may be conceded that the fair construction of the statute requires that the suspicion must be in reference to some of the species or kinds of vices enumerated in the particular section of the statute, containing the provision upon which the prosecution is founded; but then the question is, With reference to what particular vice or vices of those mentioned in the statute must the suspicion be taken to relate? General suspicion, without even reference to a propensity or intent to commit some particular crime or offense against the law or police of the government must be conceded to be wholly inoperative and without effect as a definition of crime. Mere suspicion is no evidence of crime of any particular kind, and it forms no element in the constitution of crime.

Suspicion may exist without even the knowledge of the party who is the object of the suspicion, as to the matter of which he is suspected. The suspicion may be generated in the mind of one or more persons without even colorable foundation of truth for the suspicion; and yet the party, the object of the suspicion, may, under the statute upon which the prosecution against the appellee was founded, be seized and imprisoned, tried and convicted, merely because some persons or police officer may have concluded (whether upon reasonable grounds or not) that he was a suspicious person. Of what suspected, and what degree of suspicion exists, must always be the first thought that occurs upon such a charge as that made in this case. But here the party is charged, in an abstract way, with being a suspicious person merely, there being no act or conduct of his, mentioned in the statute, to which the suspicion could relate. How is he to meet such charge? Suspicion, as a conception of the mind, is well defined as the imagination of the existence of something upon little or no evidence; doubt; mistrust; and so the adjective term "suspicious" descriptive of the quality or condition of a person, as well the party suspecting as the party suspected, is defined, as apt to imagine with little or no reason; distrustful; liable or open to suspicion; exciting suspicion; giving reasons or grounds to suspect or imagine ill.

In the return of the intendant of the workhouse to the writ of habeas corpus, it is stated, as we have seen, that the prisoner was convicted and sentenced upon a charge of being a suspicious character. This is not the same thing as a charge of being a suspicious person. The element of character is general reputation as to what the party is supposed to be. Character is in itself such reputation as is generally accredited to the party in the minds of others, for good or evil, based upon his general conduct and habits of life, in relation to those to whom he is best known.

A suspicious character, however, does not constitute crime, nor does it justify the government in treating the party having such reputation as a criminal, without connecting him with some criminal act or conduct. But, assuming that the return of the intendant was amendable, so as to make it conform to the information, and conviction thereon, it would seem to be clear that the offense as described in the statute, and in the information, is not such as will justify seizure and imprisonment of the party accused. Under the Constitution of the United States, articles 4 and 8 of the Amendments, every person is intended to be secure in his person against unreasonable searches and seizures, and against cruel and unusual punishments; and it would clearly be a cruel and unnatural punishment to impose fine and imprisonment upon a party, because he might happen to be regarded by some persons as a suspicious person, without anything more.

In the legislation of England, in regard to the police of that Kingdom, we find a great variety of regulations prescribed from time to time, dating back to the earlier reigns and all those in succession, down to modern times, to meet the requirements of the then existing states of society. But much of that legislation has become obsolete, and, from its severe restrictions upon the liberties of the people, and the cruel and unnatural punishments inflicted, it has long since ceased to be applicable to modern society, and could not at this day be tolerated. The history of that legislation is clearly stated by Mr. Justice Stephen in the third volume of his History of the Criminal Law of England, chap. 32, pp. 263-274, and in 2 Broom & Hadley, Com. 467.

The statutes now in force in England for the arrest and punishment of persons charged with idleness, disorderly conduct, and vagrancy, etc., are 5 Geo. IV., chap. 83, passed in 1824, and the amendatory acts of 1 & 2 Vict. chap. 38; 31 & 32 Vict. chap. 52; and 32 & 33 Vict. chap. 99. The statute of 5 Geo. IV. chap. 83, was a revision of pre-existing statutes upon the subject, and that statute would seem to have furnished a general outline for legislation of the same class in this country. By the 4th section of that statute, among other provisions, it is enacted "that persons found in or upon any dwelling house, warehouse, outhouse, etc., inclosed yard, garden, etc., for any unlawful purpose, suspected persons or reputed thieves, frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse near thereto, or any street, etc., leading thereto, or any place of public resort, or avenue leading thereto, or any place adjacent, with intent to commit felony; and persons apprehended as idle and disorderly persons resisting officers in their apprehension, and being subsequently convicted of the offense charged,—shall be deemed rogues and vagabonds, and may be punished by a single justice, on the oath of one witness, with imprisonment in the house of correction, with hard labor, for any time not exceeding three calendar months."

This statute of George IV., as will be observed, does what our act of Congress fails to do; it requires the suspicion imputed to the party charged to have relation to or connection with certain acts and conduct of the party, and intention to commit crime. Without such relation or connection the party could not be charged and convicted as being a rogue and vagabond. But that statute, with the definitions and limitations to which we have referred, encountered severe opposition and criticism at the time, because it gave arbitrary, dangerous, and undefined powers to a single justice, and by the indirect and malevolent exercise of which gave rise to the most vexatious imprisonment and subsequent litigation. It was found, says Mr. Chitty (1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 623), "that under that act the mere suspicion of a propensity to commit a trifling offense was punishable by a single magistrate, with three calendar months' imprisonment, without the power of obtaining release upon finding the most satisfactory sureties for his good behavior." The dangerous and arbitrary provisions of that statute have, however, been modified by subsequent statutes upon the subject. But our act of Congress of July 3, 1898, being more arbitrary than the English statute of George IV., subjects a party to seizure and conviction, to be followed by pecuniary fine or imprisonment, upon being charged with being a suspicious person merely.

In support of the prosecution and conviction (the case arising as it does upon habeas corpus, and therefore collaterally), it is contended that there was no power or jurisdiction in the court below to discharge the prisoner from the operation of the judgment and sentence of the police court; that the judgment and sentence of that court are final, and that the discharge of the prisoner from imprisonment in the workhouse, to which he had been committed in execution of judgment, was unwarranted and without the authority of law. This contention is entirely correct upon the assumption that the police court had full power and jurisdiction to take cognizance of the case, and to try and convict the accused, and to enter the judgment and sentence against him that we find stated in the record. It is argued that because the police court has jurisdiction to hear and determine prosecutions for the class of offenses enumerated in the act of Congress, among which this alleged offense is described, that therefore the court had jurisdiction in this particular case against the prisoner to proceed to try and pass judgment against him; and that the finding and judgment of the court must be accepted, in this collateral proceeding on habeas corpus, as final and conclusive; as well upon the question of jurisdiction of the court as upon the question of the guilt of the party. But this proposition, as applied to this particular case, cannot be accepted without material qualification. The judgment and sentence of the police court are assailed in this case upon the ground that the act of Congress, under which the prisoner was convicted and sentenced, is, in respect to the particular offense charged, unconstitutional, or is so indefinite, as to this particular offense, as to be void and without effect. If this position is well taken it affects the foundation of the whole proceeding. For, as said by the Supreme Court in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 376, 377, 25 L. ed. 717, 719: "An unconstitutional law is void, and is as no law. An offense created by it is not a crime. A conviction under it is not merely erroneous, but it is illegal and void, and cannot be a legal cause of imprisonment. It is true, if no writ of error lies, the judgment may be final, in the sense that there may be no means of reversing it. But personal liberty is of so great a moment in the eye of the law that the judgment of an inferior court affecting it is not deemed so conclusive but that, as we have seen, the question of the court's authority to try and imprison the party may be reviewed on habeas corpus by a superior court or judge having authority to award the writ. We are satisfied that the present is one of the cases in which this court is authorized to take such jurisdiction. We think so, because, if the laws are unconstitutional and void, the circuit court acquired no jurisdiction of the causes. Its authority to indict and try the petitioners arose solely upon these laws."

And so in the case of Re Coy, 127 U. S. 731, 32 L. ed. 274, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1263, the Supreme Court, by Mr. Justice Miller, said: "As the laws of Congress are only valid when they are within the constitutional power of that body, the validity of the statute under which a prisoner is held in custody may be inquired into under a writ of habeas corpus as affecting the jurisdiction of the court which ordered his imprisonment. And if their want of power appears on the face of the record of his condemnation, whether in the indictment or elsewhere, the court which has authority to issue the writ is bound to release him." And to the same effect is the case of Nielsen, Petitioner, 131 U. S. 176, 33 L. ed. 118, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672; indeed, many other cases might be cited in which the same doctrine is fully maintained.

We are, of course, sensible of the fact that it is only in cases where legislative power has been clearly transcended in declaring that to be law which is not within legislative competency, that courts are justified in declaring any particular provision of an act of Congress void and without effect; and especially so where the act relates to matters within the District of Columbia, over which Congress has full and exclusive legislative power. But there are certain fundamental rights of person and property, even in this District, that are beyond the power of Congress to disregard or violate. The rights secured to persons and property by the 4th and 8th Amendments to the Constitution are among such rights. The power of Congress to legislate for this District, in matters of police, is certainly very large, and necessarily so; but there are certain fundamental maxims of a free government that would seem to require that the rights of personal liberty and private property should be held sacred. At least, no court of justice in this country would be warranted in assuming that power to violate and disregard them lurked under any general grant of legislative authority, or ought to be implied from any general impressions that may be found in any of the articles of the Constitution. Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. 627, 657, 7 L. ed. 542, 553; Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch, 43, 3 L. ed. 650. It has been recently well said by the Supreme Court that "the legislature may not, under the guise of protecting the public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination as to what is a proper exercise of its police powers is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts." Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 139, 38 L. ed. 385, 389, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499. And if so in respect to the rights of private property, a fortiori should it be so in respect to the personal rights of the citizens.

From what we have said in the preceding part of this opinion, the necessary conclusion is, that the particular provision of the amendatory act of July 8, 1898, declaring that "all suspicious persons" could be arrested and prosecuted as criminals, and upon conviction be fined and imprisoned, is nugatory and without effect, and therefore the police court was without jurisdiction to try, convict, and sentence to imprisonment the appellee. Of course, this decision has reference only to the particular provision of the act of Congress upon which the prosecution against the accused was based, and to none other.

It follows that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Thomas Edwin ALLAIRE, by Next Friend,
App't.,
v.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL et al.

(184 Ill. 359.)

An infant has not before birth such an independent existence that a negligent injury to him will sustain an action in his favor after he is born.

(Boggs, J., dissents.)

(February 19, 1900.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by the Court:

The amended declaration in this case, omitting the caption, is in the words and figures as follows: "The said plaintiff, Thomas Edwin Allaire, an infant of tender age, by Ada A. Allaire, his next friend, and Philetus Smith, his attorney, by leave of the court first had, for amended declaration, complains of the said defendants, both bodies politic and corporate, and doing business at the city of Chicago, in said county, under and by virtue of the laws of said state, in a plea of trespass on the case, for that heretofore, to wit, on or about the second day of February A. D. 1896, at and in the said city, said defendants were possessed of and using a certain building there situate as a hospital for the care, curing, and treatment of sick persons, and of ladies therein during the time before, at, and after accouchement and parturition and of convalescence thereafter, and for the care, careful treatment, and medical diligence in the safe delivery of infants in ventre sa mère, all for hire and reward in that behalf. The said Ada A. Allaire, then within ten days, as near as may be, for the natural birth of plaintiff, as the said defendants then and there well knew and had knowledge, then and there, on said last-named day, at the request and solicitation of the said defendants, for hire and reward in that behalf to be paid by her, became and was a patient of said defendants in the said building, therein to be carefully kept, cared for, housed, and medically treated until the birth of plaintiff, and during her convalescence thereafter, and for such hire and reward so to be paid then and there became and was such patient of defendants, for the use and benefit of plaintiff, in that he also should receive from said defendants all due care and treatment, and should be safely delivered by birth, in the course of nature, without personal harm. And thereupon it then and there became and was the duty of defendants to carefully and comfortably house, shelter, and keep the said Ada A. Allaire in said building, and to extend to and bestow upon her person great care and diligence before, during, and after plaintiff's birth,—all this for the well-being of the said Ada A. Allaire, as also for the benefit of the plaintiff, to the end and purpose that he also should receive great and due care from said defendants, and be naturally born of his mother, without injury or harm to his person. And the plaintiff further avers that before, on, and after the day first aforesaid, at and in the said building, the said defendants were possessed of and using a certain elevator, so called, for the conveyance of patients therein through a shaft from one floor of said building to other floors therein, and the said Ada A. Allaire, then being such patient, as aforesaid, on said day last named, and in obedience to defendants' request and direction so to do, entered into such elevator, and upon the floor thereof, and then and there sat down upon a common, all-wooden chair on said floor, that had there been placed in its then position by defendants, to be carried and elevated thereon from the second floor of said building to the floor of the obstetrical department thereof above said second floor, she then and there being assured by defendants that it was and would be perfectly safe for her to be seated in said chair in its then position, to be carried upward in said elevator, and that no harm could come to her for so doing; defendants then and there well knowing that said Ada A. Allaire was then and there near to confinement for the natural birth of plaintiff. And thereupon it became and was the duty of defendants to have and keep said elevator and shaft, and each and every part thereof,

NOTE.—The cases upon this subject have heretofore been very rare, and those that have occurred are practically all set out in the report as given above. As shown by the dissenting opinion, there is an argument on both sides of the question, and the litigation involving the point is likely to be more prolific in the future, so as to make this decision an important one.

in a proper, safe, and secure condition, and keep the said mother of plaintiff and the plaintiff safely and without personal harm or injury in the use and enjoyment thereof, and to so place and condition the said mother therein and upon said floor and chair as that neither she nor the plaintiff, then in ventre sa mère, should in any way be injured or personally harmed while therein, and being carried thereby to said floor above, whither the said mother was then and there directed by defendants; yet the defendants did not nor would regard their duty in that behalf, but, on the contrary thereof, negligently and carelessly, at the place and on the day last named, and when and while the said mother of plaintiff, with all due care on her part, was then and there so conditioned and seated in said chair, and being rapidly carried upward in said elevator, failed and neglected to have and keep said shaft, elevator, and chair in a safe and secure condition and position, and to have and keep the car of the said elevator inclosed, and then and there carelessly, negligently, and heedlessly failed to properly load and operate said elevator, and did then and there so carelessly and negligently operate the same that when and while the said Ada A. Allaire was so being rapidly carried upward therein and thereon the top of said chair suddenly and with great force struck a projection in and on the side of said shaft, whereby said chair, with said mother thereon sitting, was instantly and with great power crushed to the floor of said elevator car, the said car then and there being uninclosed and open, and said mother of plaintiff and the plaintiff then and there with great force and violence thrown and hurled from and off said chair to the floor of said car and to the edge of said floor opposite said chair, and by reason thereof and the swift upward motion of said elevator car the left limb of said mother was then and there and thereby thrown and caught between the edge of said floor and a projection in said shaft, and was then and thereby greatly cut, mangled, bruised, and the bones thereof broken, and said mother greatly and grievously bruised, hurt, jammed, and wounded in her left hip, thigh, side, and body, and other great personal injuries, by reason of said negligence of defendants, said Ada A. Allaire then and thereby received and sustained, and that said mother, by reason of her said personal injuries, and the manner, way, and time in which the same were so received and sustained, was then and there put in great terror and fear that death was then for herself and plaintiff unborn, so that and thereby, and as the direct, proximate, and natural cause of said injuries to his said mother, said plaintiff was then and there, and by reason of defendants' said negligence, greatly injured, strained, bruised, wounded in his left limb, left side, left hip, left arm, and left hand, so that at his birth, on the sixth day of February, A. D. 1886, his left foot, left limb, left side, and left hand were and became, and hitherto have been and still are, wasted, withered and atrophied, and his said foot smaller than natural by 48 L. R. A.

more than one half, and made thereby to turn inward and the sole thereof upward, and his said limb shorter than natural by more than 4 inches, and his said hip, side, and arm, by reason of said negligence and injuries, became and are made shrunk, atrophied, and paralytic, and his said limb without flesh thereon, and from thence hitherto have so been and still are, and said plaintiff thereby greatly and sadly crippled for life; and in endeavoring to be cured and healed of his said injuries has laid out and expended the sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000) and more (the said Ada A. Allaire having heretofore, for a valuable consideration, settled with the said defendants for and released them from all damages for said injuries to herself alone); to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000), and therefore he brings his suit," etc. The general demurrer was filed by the defendants, which was sustained by the court, and judgment was rendered for the defendants. An appeal was thereupon taken to the appellate court, where the judgment of the lower court has been affirmed. The present appeal is from such judgment of affirmation.

Mr. Philetus Smith, for appellant:

If actual parturition be indispensable before a cause of action can accrue, then it would matter not how wilful and wicked the injury to the child in utero might be.

Whenever a child in utero is so far advanced in prenatal age as that, should parturition occur at such age, such child could and would live separable from the mother and grow into the ordinary activities of life. It would have a right of action for any personal injuries wantonly or negligently inflicted upon it at such age.

Per Curiam:

In deciding this case the appellate court delivered the following opinion:

"The action is not given by any statute, and, if maintainable, it must be so by the common law, and therefore the question is whether, at common law, the action can be maintained. Had the plaintiff, at the time of the alleged injury, in contemplation of the common law, such distinct and independent existence that he may maintain the action, or was he, in view of the common law, a part of his mother? If the former, it would seem the action can be maintained, but, if the latter, not; because, if a part of his mother, the injury was to her, and not to the plaintiff.

"Appellant's counsel has argued the case learnedly, and with not a little industry, but has cited only two cases in which it was at- 48 L. R. A.

tempted to maintain actions involving the question presented here, namely, Dietrich v. Northampton, 138 Mass. 14, 52 Am. Rep. 422 (decided in 1884), and Walker v. Great Northern R. Co. 1r. L. R. C. L. 69 (decided in 1891). In the former case the facts were that the mother, when advanced four or five months in pregnancy, slipped, and fell, by reason of a defect in the highway, the consequence of which was a miscarriage. The plaintiff was alive when delivered, but was too little advanced in fetal life to survive its premature birth. The action was brought by the administrator of the deceased infant under a statute authorizing an action for the benefit of the mother or next of kin. The trial and supreme courts both held that the action could not be maintained, the latter court saying: 'Taking all of the foregoing considerations into account, and, further, that, as the unborn child was a part of the mother at the time of the injury, any damage to it which was not too remote to be recovered for at all was recoverable by her, we think it clear that the statute sued upon does not embrace the plaintiff's intestate within its meaning.' In Walker v. Great Northern R. Co., the statement of claim was, substantially, that Annie Walker, mother of the plaintiff, while quick with child, became a passenger on the defendant's railway, and was so received by the defendant, and that the defendant so carelessly and negligently conducted itself in carrying said Annie Walker and in managing its railway that the plaintiff was thereby injured, crippled, and deformed. A demurrer was sustained to the statement of claim, all the judges concurring in the opinion that it was defective in not showing a contractual relation between the plaintiff and the railway company, but merely averring a contract between the mother of the plaintiff and the company. The question, however, whether such an action could be maintained by an infant in its mother's womb at the time of the alleged injury could, under any circumstances, be maintained, was discussed elaborately, and with great learning, both by court and counsel. O'Brien, Ch. J., after discussing the question, expressly declined to commit himself by an opinion, leaving it, as he said, 'an open question,' so far as he was concerned. Harrison, J., while basing his decision on the insufficiency of the statement of claim, says, in his opinion: 'When the accident occurred, on the 12th of June, the plaintiff was still unborn, and had no existence apart from her mother, who was the only person whom the defendants contracted to carry on their line,' etc. Johnson, J., in his opinion, says: 'As matter of fact, when the act of negligence occurred the plaintiff was not in esse,—was not a person, or a passenger, or a human being. Her age and her existence are reckoned from her birth, and no precedent has been found for this action.' Again, commenting on the claim of liability, the same learned judge says: 'If it did not spring out of contract, it must, I apprehend, have arisen (if at all), from the relative situation and circumstances of the defendants and plaintiff at the time of the occurrence of the act of negligence. But at that time the plaintiff had no actual existence,—was not a human being, and was not a passenger,—in fact, as Lord Coke says, the plaintiff was then pars viscerum matris, and we have not been referred to any authority or principle to show that a legal duty has ever been held to arise towards that which is not in esse in fact, and has only a fictitious existence in law, so as to render a negligent act a breach of that duty.' O'Brien, J., in his opinion, says of the action: 'It is admitted that such a thing was never heard of before, and yet the circumstances which would give rise to such a claim must at one time or another have existed.' In Dietrich v. Northampton, 138 Mass. 14, 52 Am. Rep. 422, the court says: 'But no case, so far as we know, has ever decided that, if the infant survived, it could maintain an action for injuries received by it while in its mother's womb.'

"Appellant's counsel substantially admits that there is no precedent for the action. While it is true that this is not conclusive that the action may not be maintained, yet, in view of the fact that, as said by Mr. Associate Justice O'Brien, similar circumstances must have before occurred, it is entitled to great weight, especially when the right to maintain the action is, to say the least, doubtful. Mr. Associate Justice O'Brien, in Walker v. Great Northern R. Co., says: "The law is, in some respects, a stream, that gathers accretions, with time, from new relations and conditions. But it is also a landmark that forbids advance on defined rights and engagements; and, if these are to be altered,—if new rights and engagements are to be created,—that is the province of legislation and not of decision.' In this we fully concur. That a child before birth is, in fact, a part of the mother, and is only severed from her at birth, cannot, we think, be successfully disputed. The doctrine of the civil law and the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts, therefore, that an unborn child may be regarded as in esse for some purposes, when for its benefit, is a mere legal fiction, which, so far as we have been able to discover, has not been indulged in by the courts of common law to the extent of allowing an action by an infant for injuries occasioned before its birth. If the action can be maintained, it necessarily follows that an infant may maintain an action against its own mother for injuries occasioned by the negligence of the mother while pregnant with it. We are of opinion that the action will not lie. The judgment will be affirmed."

We concur in the foregoing views, and in the conclusion reached by the appellate court. Accordingly, the judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Boggs, J., dissenting:

It may be conceded no case adjudicated at the common law can be found wherein a plaintiff was awarded damages for injuries inflicted upon his person while in the womb of his mother. But an adjudicated case is not indispensable to establish a right to recover under the rules of the common law.

Lord Mansfield declared: "The law of England he observed, would be an absurd science were it founded upon precedents only. Precedents," he observed, "were to illustrate principles, and to give them a fixed certainty." 1 Kent, Com. 477. In speaking of the establishment and growth of rights at the common law, Mr. Cooley, in his work on Torts (pp. 13-15), said: "The process of growth has been something like the following: Every principle declared by a court in giving judgment is supposed to be a principle more or less general in its application, and which is applied under the facts of the case, because, in the opinion of the court, the facts bring the case within the principle. The case is not the measure of the principle. It does not limit and confine it within the exact facts, but it furnishes an illustration of the principle, which, perhaps, might still have been applied had some of the facts been different. Thus, one by one, important principles become recognized through adjudications which illustrate them, and which constitute authoritative evidence of what the law is when other cases shall arise. But cases are seldom exactly alike in their facts. They are, on the contrary, infinite in their diversities; and, as numerous controversies on differing facts are found to be within the reach of the same general principle, the principle seems to grow and expand, and does actually become more comprehensive, though so steadily and insensibly, under legitimate judicial treatment, that for the time the expansion passes unobserved. But new and peculiar cases must also arise from time to time, for which the courts must find the governing principle, and these may either be referred to some principle previously declared, or to some one which now, for the first time, there is occasion to apply. But a principle newly applied is not supposed to be a new principle. On the contrary, it is assumed that from time immemorial it has constituted a part of the common law of the land, and that it has only not been applied before because no occasion has arisen for its application." At the common law, actions were maintainable to recover damages occasioned by injuries to the person of the plaintiff, whether inflicted intentionally or through the negligence of the defendant. The governing principle illustrated by such cases is that the common law, by way of damages, gave redress for personal injuries inflicted by the wrong or neglect of another. The case disclosed by the declaration under consideration is embraced within the limits of the principle thus recognized, and it is clear recovery could have been maintained at common law unless the fact the plaintiff was unborn when the alleged injuries were inflicted would have operated to deny a right of action. The argument is that at the common law an unborn child was but a part of the mother, and had no existence or being which could be the subject-matter of injury distinct from the mother, and that an injury to it was but an injury to the mother; that in such case there was but one person,—one life,—that of the mother. A fetus in the womb of the mother may well be regarded as but a part of the bowels of the mother during a portion of the period of gestation; but if, while in the womb, it reaches that prenatal age of viability when the destruction of the life of the mother does not necessarily end its existence also, and when, if separated prematurely, and by artificial means, from the mother, it would be so far a matured human being as that it would live and grow, mentally and physically, as other children generally, it is but to deny a palpable fact to argue there is but one life, and that the life of the mother. Medical science and skill and experience have demonstrated that at a period of gestation in advance of the period of parturition the fœtus is capable of independent and separate life, and that, though within the body of the mother, it is not merely a part of her body, for her body may die in all of its parts and the child remain alive, and capable of maintaining life, when separated from the dead body of the mother. If at that period a child so advanced is injured in its limbs or members, and is born into the living world suffering from the effects of the injury, is it not sacrificing truth to a mere theoretical abstraction to say the injury was not to the child, but wholly to the mother?

A child in ventre sa mère was regarded at the common law as in esse from the time of conception for the purpose of taking any estate, whether by descent or devise, or under the statute of distribution, if the infant was born alive after such a period of fœtal existence that its continuance in life was or might be reasonably expected. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 624; Co. Litt. 36. Blackstone, after declaring the right of personal security to be an absolute right, says: "The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health, and his reputation. Life is the immediate gift of God,—a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins, in contemplation of law, as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb. For, if a woman is quick with child, and by a potion or otherwise killeth it in her womb, or if any one beat her, whereby the child dieth in her body, and she is delivered of a dead child, this, though not murder, was, by the ancient law, homicide or manslaughter." [1 Bl. Com. *129, 139]. Though it was the rule of the common law if one should unlawfully beat a woman pregnant with child, and thereby cause the child to die in the body of the mother, the crime was not deemed to be murder, but the ancient crime of homicide or manslaughter, still the doctrine of the common law was, if the child should not die in the womb of the mother, but should be born alive, and should afterwards die in consequence of the assault while in the womb of the mother, the offense was deemed to be murder. 3 Co. Inst. 50; [Beale v. Beale] 1 P. Wms. 246. If, in the contemplation of the common law, life begins as soon as the infant is able to stir in the mother's womb, and that an injury inflicted upon an infant while in the womb of the mother shall be deemed murder if the infant survive the wound during prenatal life, but succumbs to it, and dies from it after being born, and if every legitimate infant in ventre sa mère is to be deemed as born for all purposes beneficial to the child, why should it be supposed the common law would have denied to an infant born alive the right to recover damages for the injury inflicted upon it while in the womb of the mother? Had such injury, though inflicted on the child while in the mother's womb, been sufficient to cause the death of the infant after it had been born alive, the common law would have regarded the injury as having been inflicted upon a human being, and punished the perpetrator accordingly; and, that being true, why should the infant which survives be denied the right to recover damages occasioned by the same injury? In the case at bar the infant, when the injury was inflicted, had, as the declaration alleged, reached that advanced stage of fœtal life which would have, according to the experience of mankind, and according to the medical learning of the age, endowed it with such vitality and vigor, and with members and faculties so far complete and mature, that it could have maintained independent life, and the death of the mother would not have deprived it of life. It is but natural justice that such an infant, if born alive, should be allowed to maintain an action in the courts for injuries so wrongly committed upon its person while so in the womb of the mother.

Two cases are much relied upon as in opposition to this view. One is the case of Dietrich v. Northampton, 138 Mass. 14, 52 Am. Rep. 422. The facts there were: A woman four or five months advanced in pregnancy slipped and fell by reason of a defect in the highway, in consequence of which there was a miscarriage. The child was alive when delivered, but was too little advanced in fœtal life to survive its premature birth, and died before it was severed from its mother. The person of the infant was not directly injured otherwise than by a communication of the shock to the mother, and it was held an action to recover damages did not accrue to an administrator of the child. This case can have little application here, for the reason that in the case at bar it appears from the declaration that the child had reached that stage of fœtal life when it was capable of continued existence independent of the mother; that its person was injured within itself, and it was afterwards born alive, and with sufficient strength and maturity to maintain independent existence, and still lives. It does not follow from the Dietrich Case that the plaintiff in this cause should not be recognized as capable of having a locus standi in court to recover damages for injuries to his person, or that the supreme court of Massachusetts would have so held.

The other case is that of Walker v. Great Northern R. Co. Ir. L. R. 28 C. L. 69, in which the facts were: A woman far advanced in pregnancy took passage on defendant's railway. There was an accident to the train, whereby the mother and the child were seriously injured, so that the child was born a cripple. The action was by the child to recover damages, and on demurrer the court held the suit could not be maintained. The cause could only have been sustained on the ground the defendant road had failed to observe some duty it owed to the child arising generally by reason of its position as a common carrier, or of some contract with the child. The declaration did not disclose the railroad company had knowledge of the existence of the child, or of the condition of the mother, or that there was any contract with reference to the carriage of the child, or any consideration paid for such carriage. The ruling of the court that the railway company was not answerable to the child can have no influence adverse to the plaintiff in the case at bar. Here the appellee hospital knew of the condition of the mother, and of the existence of the plaintiff in her womb, contracted with direct reference to the safety and care of both mother and child, and received compensation for the performance of a duty to both. If in delivering a child, an attending physician, acting for a compensation, should wantonly or by actionable negligence injure the limbs of the infant, and thereby cause the child, although born alive and living, to be maimed and crippled in body or members, it would be abhorrent to every impulse of justice or reason to deny to such a child a right of action against such physician to recover damages for the wrongs and injuries inflicted by such physician. The appellee corporation owed it as a duty to the plaintiff, though unborn, to bestow due and ordinary care and skill to the matter of his preservation and safety before and at the time of his birth. It appeared from the declaration that that duty was neglected, and that the limbs and body of plaintiff received injuries by reason of such negligence, and that his legs and arms are now maimed and crippled by reason thereof. Should compensation for his injuries be denied on a mere theory—known to be false—that the injury was not to his person, but to the person of the mother? The law should, it seems to me, be that whenever a child in utero is so far advanced in prenatal age as that, should parturition by natural or artificial means occur at such age, such child could and would live separable from the mother, and grow into the ordinary activities of life, and is afterwards born, and becomes a living human being, such child has a right of action for any injuries wantonly or negligently inflicted upon his or her person at such age of viability, though then in the womb of the mother. That proposition having been established, that an adjustment of damages with the mother could not preclude the child would naturally and necessarily follow.

The argument that there can be no certainty that an unborn child is dead or alive when an injury is inflicted upon the mother is answered by the allegations of the declaration that the plaintiff was born alive, and is a living human being. There was, therefore, no uncertainty as to the fact that the plaintiff was alive in the mother's womb when the injuries were inflicted.

v.

City of CHICAGO.

(176 Ill. 340.)

1. Cigarettes are not included among the "other provisions" referred to in Rev. Stat. chap. 24, art. 5, § 1, ¶ 50, providing for the regulation by cities of sales of specified articles of food "and all other provisions."
2. An ordinance requiring a license for the sale of cigarettes is within the authority given by Rev. Stat. chap. 24, art. 5, § 1, ¶ 68, authorizing the enforcement of "all necessary police ordinances," and § 78, authorizing all acts and regulations "which may be necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease."
3. An ordinance prohibiting the sale of cigarettes without a license does not violate the constitutional provisions as to due process of law, or any constitutional rights.
4. An ordinance providing that the mayor shall grant licenses in certain cases does not delegate the power of the city council to him, when the council in substance grants the licenses by authorizing him to do so when certain conditions are complied with.

(October 24, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Cook County convicting him of violating an ordinance against the sale of cigarettes without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lee D. Mathias, with Mr. Charles H. Aldrich, for appellant:

When the charter of municipal corporations or the general incorporation act under which a city is organized provides what powers shall be exercised by the common council, the enumeration of those powers implies the exclusion of all others.

Rev. Stat. chap. 24, § 63, ¶¶ 50, 53, do not authorize the enactment of the ordinance.

NOTE.—This case has been recently affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. —, Advance Sheets, page 634, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633.

In McGregor v. Cone (Iowa) 39 L. R. A. 484, it was held that the original package of commerce when cigarettes were shipped in a wooden box containing packages of cigarettes, each of which was sealed with an internal revenue stamp, was the wooden box, and not the stamped package. But in Austin v. State, 101 Tenn. 583, the supreme court of Tennessee held that cigarettes are not legitimate articles of commerce within the protection of the United States Constitution because they possess no virtue, but are inherently bad, and only bad. This case is understood to be pending in the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error.

Neither the ordinance nor the judgment of the court below is unconstitutional.

Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 186.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was tried on an agreed statement of facts, which showed that the city of Chicago, by its city council, adopted an ordinance which provides, by § 1, that the mayor shall, from time to time, grant licenses authorizing the sale of cigarettes. It further provides what formalities shall be observed by the applicant in making his application, such as a bond to obey the laws, affidavit of good character and reputation, etc., and gives to the mayor a discretion to determine whether a license shall be issued. Section 2 provides for a license fee of $100 per year, and that no license shall be granted to sell cigarettes within 200 feet of a schoolhouse. Section 3 provides that every license granted shall be at the rate of $100 per year. Section 4 grants the power to the mayor to revoke any license for cause. Sections 5 and 6 provide the manner of selling cigarettes. Section 7 makes the commissioner of health the general supervisor and inspector to see that the sale of cigarettes is carried on according to law. Section 8 prescribes the penalty for the violation of the terms of the ordinance. Section 9 is that the ordinance shall be in force after its due passage and publication. The statement further shows that appellant, on or about the 31st day of December, 1897, while said ordinance was in force, and after the same had been duly published, did have, keep, and expose for sale, and offer to sell, cigarettes within the city of Chicago, without having first procured a license, as required by said ordinance. The defendant was convicted before a justice of the peace, and a fine of $50 and costs entered against him, from which he prosecuted an appeal to the criminal court of Cook county, where, on trial on the foregoing statement of facts, he was found guilty, and a fine of $50 assessed against him. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were overruled, to which he excepted, and judgment was entered against him.

The defense was based on the ground that the ordinance in question, as enacted by the city council, was not within the powers delegated to the city by the legislature, and hence was null and void, and that the ordinance and judgment of the court deprived the appellant of liberty and property without due process of law, in violation of the Constitution of the state of Illinois and of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which latter in part provides: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The contention of appellee is that the power to enact this ordinance is expressly granted by § 50, § 1, art. 5, chap. 24, of our Revised Statutes, which provides that the common councils of cities shall have power "to regulate the sale of meats, poultry, fish, butter, cheese, lard, vegetables, and all other provisions, and to provide for place and manner of selling the same." The power to license and regulate the sale of cigarettes, it is contended, is included within that paragraph, and that the term "all other provisions" includes tobacco in the list of enumerated articles by the language as used.

The articles—meats, poultry, fish, butter, cheese, and lard—which are expressly enumerated in the above paragraph, and the power expressly given therein to regulate the sale thereof, are articles of food for man, and include, by the express enumeration of articles, only provisions to be used for man. The term "other provisions," by a familiar canon of construction, can extend only to articles of the same character as those specifically enumerated. When general words follow an enumeration of particular things, such words must be held to include only such things or objects as are of the same kind as those specifically enumerated. Re Swigert, 119 Ill. 83, 59 Am. Rep. 789, 6 N. E. 469; Cecil v. Green, 161 Ill. 265, 32 L. R. A. 566, 43 N. E. 1105; Emmons v. Levisstown, 132 Ill. 380, 8 L. R. A. 328, 24 N. E. 58. Lexicographers have given to the term "provisions" a broader meaning than that of food for man. The meaning of general terms used in a statute, or in one section thereof, may be often determined from the connection in which the language is used and the purpose to be subserved. Paragraph 50, above, providing for the regulation of the sale of certain enumerated articles of food for man of daily consumption, followed by the general term "all other provisions," cannot be held to include in the term "all other provisions" such an article as tobacco in any of its various forms. Although it may be an article of frequent use, yet it is not included within the meaning of the term "food for man." The contention of appellant is that no express power is given to regulate the sale of tobacco by the provisions of § 50. We hold that contention of appellant must be sustained, and that by § 50 no power is given to the city council to regulate the sale of tobacco.

It is insisted by appellee that if no express authority for licensing the sale of cigarettes is given under § 50, above quoted, the power exists as an implied power under §§ 53, 66, and 78 of said § 1, which provide as follows: "Fifty-Third. To provide for and regulate the inspection of meats, poultry, fish, butter, cheese, lard, vegetables, cotton, tobacco, flour, meal, and other provisions." "Sixty-Sixth. To regulate the police of the city or village, and pass and enforce all necessary police ordinances." "Seventy-Eighth. To do all acts, make all regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease." An ordinance may derive its validity from several different grants of power, and not depend solely upon any single section or clause of a statute. Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 359, 16 N. E. 260. An implied power of a municipal corporation is a power necessarily incident to the exercise of those powers expressly granted and directly and immediately appropriate to their exercise. People ex rel. Peabody v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 22 N. E. 798; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, 148 Ill. 141, 35 N. E. 881; Mather v. Ottawa, 114 Ill. 659, 3 N. E. 216. The power to regulate the sale of an article includes the power to require a license to authorize the sale thereof. Farwell v. Chicago, 71 Ill. 269; Chicago Packing & P. Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545; Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 359, 16 N. E. 260. The licensing of a sale of an article is a legitimate means of regulating its sale. Chicago Packing & P. Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 221, 30 Am. Rep. 545. By the paragraphs above quoted, power is expressly given the city to provide for and regulate the inspection of various enumerated articles, including tobacco, and this would include the various forms in which that product is prepared and used. The purpose of conferring this power of providing for and regulating the inspection of those various enumerated articles is to subserve the public welfare and protect the public health. The measure has relation to the public health, and is required in that interest. With this object evidently in view, the legislature passed an act, approved June 15, 1887, in force July 1, 1887, entitled "An Act to Prohibit Selling, Giving, or Furnishing Tobacco, in Any of Its Forms, to Minors, and Providing a Penalty Therefor." Section 1 of said act provides: "That hereafter no person or persons in this state shall sell, buy for, or furnish any cigar or cigarette, or tobacco in any of its forms, to any minor under sixteen years of age, unless upon the written order of parent or guardian." Section 2 provides that, if any person or persons shall violate the provisions of § 1, he, she, or they shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay for each offense the sum of $20. The object and purpose of this enactment were to subserve and protect the health and welfare of the class of persons to whom the act refers, and to whom a sale is forbidden. The consensus of opinion in reference to the use of cigarettes is that they are injurious to the young with immature minds, and common observation causes us to know that tobacco in the form of cigarettes is more largely used by those of young and immature minds than by any other class.

It is urged by appellant that the city council has no right to single out a particular form of manufactured tobacco, and provide for its regulation, and require a license for its sale, without making the requirement apply to all the forms in which tobacco may be used. It being well known that young persons of weak and immature minds are more liable to use tobacco in the form of cigarettes than in any other form, a legislative body may properly provide for the regulation and sale of that article in the form in which it is likely to be most deleterious and injurious, and may restrict the sales of that particular form of tobacco. Paragraph 66, before quoted, expressly authorizes the adoption of ordinances necessary to police power; and § 78 is an express authorization of the city council to make all regulations necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease. Under these two provisions, express authority is granted the municipality to pass all ordinances or requirements tending to promote the public health, morals, security, comfort, and welfare of the community. Such legislation is included within the provision authorizing the enactment of police regulations. The most important of police powers is that of caring for the health of the community, and that is inherent in a municipality, and may be exercised whether expressly granted or not, because the preservation of the health of the public is indispensable to the existence of the municipal corporation. Ferguson v. Selma, 43 Ala. 400.

The regulation of the police power is hardly susceptible of exact definition, as the exigencies of each case are varying, and the 48 L. R. A.

cases are innumerable where the health of the inhabitants of the municipality may be in some degree endangered. When the city council considers some occupation or thing dangerous to the health of the community, and, in the exercise of its discretion, passes an ordinance to prevent such a danger, it is the policy of the law to favor such legislation as being humane and essential to the preservation and protection of the community. Municipalities are allowed a greater degree of liberty of legislation in this direction than any other. The necessity for action is often more urgent, and the consequences of neglect are more detrimental to the public good, in this than in any other form of local evil. It being clear that the public health and welfare of a large class in the community would be subserved and protected by ordinances regulating the sale of tobacco in one of its manufactured forms, an ordinance directed to the protection of the health or welfare of that particular class of the community would be a police regulation within the power of a city to enact under the power expressly granted by §§ 66 and 78. An ordinance of this character is not in conflict with any principle of the common law, or with any public or general statute, and infringes no private right not necessarily infringed in the interests of good government. It subserves the public welfare, protects the health of the community, and is included within the express powers granted the city council. The ordinance was not void.

Neither did the ordinance and the judgment of the court deprive the appellant of liberty or property without due process of law. The city having the authority to enact the ordinance and provide a penalty for its violation, which ordinance applies to all citizens within the community, no principle of the Constitution of the state of Illinois or of the United States, or the amendments thereto, was violated.

Appellant insists that the ordinance is void because it delegates to the mayor the power to determine whether the license should be granted. In Swarth v. People ex rel. Pawton, 109 Ill. 621, it was said (626): "It is true, the ordinance prescribing the duties of the mayor in issuing licenses says that he shall, under certain circumstances, 'grant' licenses to certain persons, while the statute authority to 'grant' such licenses is given only to the city council; but the substance of the ordinance is that the city council grants licenses to a certain class of persons upon certain conditions, by authorizing the mayor to 'grant,' that is, to issue or cause license to be issued, when the conditions are complied with. This is not a delegation to the mayor of the power of the council. We see no objection to the form in which this power of the council is exercised, or the mode in which the license was issued." The ordinance, by its terms, fixes the rate per annum to be charged for a license, and regulates the price and object of sale of the particular article to which it refers, all of which is enacted by the city council. That license is to be granted or issued by the mayor, and thus carrying out the express will of the city council as to issuing the license is not exercising a power conferred on the city council, but is a method by which the council exercises its power as to the manner in which the license is to be issued. In this there is no delegation to the mayor of the power of the city council. The appellant, however, is not in a position to raise this question, from the facts appearing in this record. He was not an applicant for a license, which had been refused him, but was before the court admitting that he had violated an ordinance of the city of Chicago duly passed and published, and denying the right of the city to adopt such ordinance regulating the sale of cigarettes. He is not in a position to invoke the judgment of this court as to his right to a license, nor is that question before us. We are of the opinion that the ordinance was within the express powers granted to the city council, and the judgment of the court was not violative of any provision of the state or Federal Constitution.

The judgment of the Criminal Court of Cook County is affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Milliard W. SIMONS et al., Appts.,
v.

Benjamin B. BOLLINGER.

(.....Ind.)

An estate by entireties, and not one of joint tenancy, is created by a deed made to husband and wife "jointly," and the word "jointly" will be construed as surplusage.

(January 24, 1900.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lagrange County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

Daniel Weaver conveyed to David S. Kerr and Clara Kerr certain real estate. They, on January 17, 1894, conveyed to Benjamin B. Bollinger. On May 5, 1893, Milliard W. Simons recovered a judgment against David S. Kerr. On April 11, 1898, Simons issued execution against Kerr, which was levied upon the undivided half of the property as belonging to Kerr, and Bollinger thereupon brought this action to quiet his title.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. F. J. Duntan, J. E. McClaskey, and J. M. VanFleet, for appellants:

Tenants by the entirety do not hold the title "jointly."

Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 424, 89 Am. Dec. 471; Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 398; Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 N. E. 64; Thornburg v. Wiggins, 135 Ind. 178, 22 L. R. A. 42, 34 N. E. 999; Dodge v. Kinzy, 101 Ind. 102.

If the word "jointly," added to language which would create an estate in common, changes it to an estate in joint tenancy, we are unable to see why the addition of the same word to language which would create an estate by entireties will not change it to one in joint tenancy.

Case v. Owen, 139 Ind. 22, 38 N. E. 395.

The addition of the words "in joint tenancy" to a deed conveying land to husband and wife, makes them joint tenants, and not tenants by entireties.

Tenancies by entireties are strongly established in our law, and if there should be ambiguity or doubt, in a conveyance to husband and wife, the instrument must be construed to create them by entireties.

Hadley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Kerr and wife held land conveyed to them by deed in the words following: "Convey and warrant to David S. Kerr and Clara Kerr, his wife, jointly, the," etc. The only question presented for decision is whether the words employed created in David and Clara Kerr an estate in joint tenancy or an estate by entireties. It is agreed that, if they created an estate in joint tenancy, the judgment should be reversed, and, if an estate by entirety, it should be affirmed. It is also conceded by appellants that "the omission from the deed of the word 'jointly' would clearly make Kerr and wife tenants by the entirety, so that the exact question is, Does that word make them joint tenants?"

Section 3341, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894 (§ 2922, Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897), is as follows: "All conveyances and devises of lands, or of any interest therein, made to two or more persons, except as provided in the next following section, shall be construed to create estates in common, and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressed therein that the grantees or devisees shall hold the same in joint tenancy and to the survivor of them, or it shall manifestly appear, from the tenor of the instrument, that it was intended to create an estate in joint tenancy." The exception is in these words [§ 2923]: "The preceding section shall not apply to mortgages, nor to conveyances in trust, nor when made to husband and wife; and every estate vested in executors or trustees, as such, shall be held by them in joint tenancy." It will be observed that the question we have here is not controlled by the statutes, but must be determined by the rules of the common law. Under the common law the two estates have been recognized from a very early period in the history of the law. The distinctive difference between them is: (1) A joint tenancy may be vested in any number of natural persons, more than one. A tenancy by entirety can be vested only in husband and wife. (2) Joint tenants take by moieties, and each is seised of an undivided moiety and of the whole (per my et per tout), while husband and wife take each the entirety (per tout). (3) Joint tenants may severally alienate their interests. Husband and wife can do so only by acting jointly. (4) Joint tenants may sever and continue to hold their estates. The estate of husband and wife is inseverable while it remains theirs. (5) Joint tenants may have partition. Husband and wife cannot, during the marriage. Upon the death of one joint tenant, his estate is cast upon the survivors, and the last survivor takes the whole. Upon the death of husband or wife, the survivor takes the whole. Freeman, Co-Ten. § 64. Undoubtedly there is an element of joint holding in both estates. Joint tenants hold jointly the whole and the several parts. Tenants by the entirety hold jointly the whole. This common jointure has been recognized by eminent authors in treating of tenancies by entireties as a species of joint tenancy. "A still more peculiar joint estate is that which belongs to a husband and wife, where the same is conveyed to them as such." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 672, § 6. Preston says: "Tenancy by entireties is when husband and wife take an estate to themselves jointly by grant or devise." 2 Preston, Estates, 129. "This is a peculiar tenancy, and arises at common law when an estate is conveyed or demised to a husband and wife jointly during coverture." Whart. Conv. 121. "Tenancy by entireties occurs . . . where the husband and wife are jointly seised, to them and their heirs, of an estate made during the coverture.

. . . It constitutes the most intimate union of ownership known to the law." 2 Challis, Real Prop. 282. In many of our cases this court has referred to the seisin of husband and wife as being joint. In Bevins v. Cline, 21 Ind. 40, it is said: "There are four kinds of joint tenancies at common law, viz.: In common, in parcenary, in joint tenancy, and in tenancy by entireties. . . . A conveyance of land made to a man or woman, who are then husband and wife, they take as joint tenants, by entireties." To the same effect, see Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 424, 89 Am. Dec. 471; Jones v. Chandler, 40 Ind. 588, 592; Anderson v. Tannehill, 42 Ind. 141; Patton v. Rankin, 68 Ind. 245, 34 Am. Rep. 254; Phelps v. Smith, 116 Ind. 387, 391, 17 N. E. 602, and 19 N. E. 156; Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 222, 46 Am. Rep. 210; Morrison v. Seybold, 92 Ind. 298. In Hadlock v. Gray, 104 Ind., at page 598, 4 N. E. 108, it was said by Elliott, J.: "It is true that where real property is conveyed to husband and wife jointly, and there are no limiting words in the deed, they will take the estate as tenants in entirety." It is also said by Hackney, J., in Brown v. Brown, 133 Ind., at page 477, 2 N. E. 1128: "The question is now well settled in this state that if a conveyance be made to husband and wife jointly, and without words limiting the estate taken, they will take as tenants in entirety." Words of like import abound in our text-books and adjudicated cases in referring to estates of husband and wife; and, while it is well settled that technically the estate of joint tenancy and estate by the entirety are separate and distinct estates, yet the frequent reference by courts and authors to them both as joint estates, whatever the fact may be, should be of service in determining the legal effect of the word "jointly" as used in the deed under review, and whether the word was aptly or inaptly employed. Moreover, joint tenancies had their origin under a government that discouraged the severance of landed estates, to promote which policy all conveyances to two or more persons, except to husband and wife, were held to be joint tenancies unless by clear and apt words of limitation some other was described. All presumptions and doubts were turned to the support of joint tenancies. Case v. Owen, 139 Ind. 22, 38 N. E. 395; Freeman, Co-Ten. § 18. In this country the policy and rule of construction are directly reversed. In this and most of the states, from our earliest history, the political policy has been to encourage the distribution of lands among the people to advance which all conveyances to more than one person, except to husband and wife, have been construed to be tenancies in common, unless another estate is fixed by express and definite words of limitation. Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 222, 46 Am. Rep. 210. Sections 3341 and 3342, supra, which are reenactments of former statutes to the same effect, emphasize two propositions, viz.: (1) That joint tenancies must be held in disfavor and refused except when forced by clear and unmistakable words; and (2) that the rule of the common law, as applicable to conveyances to husband and wife, should remain undisturbed in this state. The strength of that rule is stated by an eminent author in these words: "But, if our theory needs any further support, this support is found in the fact that all the English adjudications upon this subject, as well as all the earlier writers upon the common law, assert that husband and wife cannot, by any words of limitation, however well chosen for that purpose, receive an estate as joint tenants." Freeman, Co-Ten. § 64. While the rule has been somewhat relaxed in this state in deference to the contractual rights of parties, the rule nevertheless exists, that all presumptions must be indulged, and all doubts resolved, against such estates, and in favor of estates by entireties, in conveyances to husband and wife. The words "convey and warrant to David Kerr and Clara Kerr, his wife, jointly," do not in terms create in the spouses a joint tenancy; and whether the word "jointly" was intended to relate to the union of the title and enjoyment, or to characterize the seisin and tenancy, or whether it was inaptly used by the grantor, and without legal signification, as we have seen so frequently happen with eminent authors and judges, is not altogether free from doubt; but, however this may be, it is clear that, under the rule above stated, we must construe it to be surplusage; and the estate conveyed, one of entireties. The cases of Thornburg v. Wiggins, 135 Ind. 178, 22 L. R. A. 42, 34 N. E. 999, and Wilkins v. Young, 144 Ind. 1, 41 N. E. 68, 590, are not analogous. In each of these cases the words employed were "in joint tenancy,"—the very language of the books,—and we are satisfied that the application of the rule in these cases was as liberal as is warranted by the authorities. Case v. Owen, 139 Ind. 22, 38 N. E. 395, has no application. In the Owen Case the grantees were unmarried.

ERROR to the District Court for Wabaunsee County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for alleged publication of a libel. Affirmed.

Statement by Johnston, J.:

Action by Edmund Redgate to recover damages from Wyatt Roush, W. H. Goodwin, E. Parmiter, and C. L. Wilkinson for alleged libels written and published by them. Redgate was a member of the Church of Christ, had preached in different churches of that denomination, and for three years prior to 1897 had preached for the congregation at Wilmington, Kansas, of which organization the defendants were elders. In 1897 his conduct and services were not satisfactory to that church, and at a meeting of the elders the fellowship of the church was withdrawn from the plaintiff, and official notice of the action taken was sent to, and published in, the Octographic Review, of Indianapolis, Ind.; the Christian Leader, of Cincinnati, Ohio; the Firm Foundation, of Austin, Tex.; and in the Primitive, of Panama, Neb.—sectarian papers published in the interest of the Church of Christ. The following is the notice which was so published:

To Whom it may Concern:

Wilmington, Kan., June 5.

This is to certify that on the 9th day of May, 1897, fellowship was withdrawn from one E. Redgate, a member of the Church of Christ at this place, and also a preacher. The charges against him were insubordination, and separating himself from the congregation, and trying to create a faction, and therefore we cannot commend him as worthy of the confidence of the brotherhood. He has tried to undermine the church here in various ways, and has shown himself utterly void of the spirit of Christ. There are other charges that could be preferred and sustained. Any other information that is wanted we will give when requested, and for any other reference we refer you to our sister congregation at Harveyville, 3½ miles north. We further state: Anything he may say or do to try to show that the Wilmington congregation is divided in his case is false; for there is not a member in the congregation, to the best of our knowledge, at the present time, but what believes he has walked disorderly, and to the detriment of the church.

E. Parmiter.
Wyatt Roush.
W. H. Goodwin.
C. L. Wilkinson.

In his petition the plaintiff alleged that the publication was maliciously made, with the intention of destroying his reputation as a preacher, and taking away his only means of support. The defendants answered by a general denial, and the averment that the plaintiff was never at any time a qualified and acting minister of the gospel of that denomination. Issue being joined and the trial had, the plaintiff introduced his testimony, after which the court sustained a demurrer to the evidence, and gave judgment for the defendants.

Messrs. Isenhardt & Alexander, for plaintiff in error:

A privileged communication is: "A communication made in good faith upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has, or honestly believes he has, a duty to a person having a corresponding interest or duty."

Newell, Defamation, Slander, & Libel, p. 388.

In this case it is impossible for the defendants to bring themselves under this rule.

If the communication is of such a character that the expressions contained in it are beyond what common sense indicates to be justifiable, it cannot be held to be privileged.

Newell, Defamation, Slander, & Libel, pp. 392, 393.

A person must not step beyond bounds, even in cases of communications privileged in their character, and if the occasion is used merely as a means of enabling the party publishing the libel to indulge in his malice the occasion will furnish no excuse.

Bradley v. Heath, 12 Pick. 163, 22 Am. Dec. 418.

While a communication made to church authorities concerning a priest or minister might be privileged if made by a member, still the circulation of a pamphlet and the publication of the same outside the church are not privileged.

State v. Bienvenu, 36 La. Ann. 378.

Mr. R. C. Heiser for defendants in error.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the principal questions presented for decision is whether the communication complained of was privileged under the law. It was alleged that it was made in bad faith, and with the malicious purpose of injuring the plaintiff. The publication is defamatory in character, and naturally would largely deprive the plaintiff of the confidence of the members of his church organization throughout the country. If it was false in fact and maliciously made, the plaintiff is entitled to recover to the extent of the injury suffered, unless the relations of the parties and the circumstances of the case justified the publication, and brought the defendants within the privilege and protection of the law. The defamatory statement was not absolutely privileged, as words spoken or written by judges, jurors, or witnesses in the course of judicial proceedings, or as in legislative debates, but it was, at most, a case of qualified privilege. Whether it was so privileged must be determined by the position occupied by the defendants, their relations to the plaintiff and to other members of the same denomination, and the circumstances under which the publication was made. If the statements were published in good faith, and in the performance of what was honestly deemed to be an official or moral duty towards other church members, and for the benefit and protection of the church organization at large, and there was a reasonable occasion for the publication, it is privileged and protected. On the face of the publication there is no vilification, extravagant language, or evidence of a wrong motive, and it would seem that the occasion fairly justified the publication of the defamatory matter. They were officers of the church, and were concerned in its welfare; the conduct and character of the plaintiff as their pastor had become a subject of official inquiry; and it had been found that he was "void of the spirit of Christ," insubordinate, disorderly, and unworthy of the confidence of the brotherhood. The result of their inquiry was a matter of interest, not only to them and the church of Wilmington, but to other members of their church organization throughout the country. If the plaintiff was unworthy or unfit to discharge the sacred functions of his high calling, the defendants, interested in the welfare of the denomination throughout the land, would appear to have been justified in warning other members and congregations of that organization to whom the plaintiff might offer his services as pastor. If the publication is prima facie privileged, it devolves on the plaintiff to allege and prove that it was both false in fact and malicious in purpose. Instead of showing actual malice, the plaintiff called two of the defendants as witnesses, who showed plainly enough that they were free from malice, and that the defendants honestly believed that duty and the interests of the denomination required that their fellow members living elsewhere should be informed of the character and conduct of the plaintiff. Instead of showing malice, as he was required to do, the plaintiff proved pure motive and a justifiable occasion for the publication. In Shurtleff v. Stevens, 51 Vt. 501, 31 Am. Rep. 698, it is held that the good name and standing of every member of such an organization are matter of common interest to all the rest, and that all are affected by the fidelity with which their preachers perform their sacred functions. In the opinion it is stated that, "in order to be successful teachers of morality, they must be unspotted public exemplars of it. Hence, if it be suspected that a wolf in sheep's clothing has invaded their ranks and sits at their council board, it is not only for the interest of all the members of the association to know the fact, but it is their imperative duty to make inquiry and ascertain the fact. They owe such duty to the plaintiff as a brother member, if he is charged with scandalous conduct, to the end that his innocence may be established. They owe it to themselves lest by indifference they give apparent approval to his conduct. Their intimate official relation to the plaintiff in the cause of their common work leaves them no other alternative, and if, in making such inquiry and in acting upon the subject-matter of it, they proceed with honesty of purpose and act from a sense of duty, the law protects them." It was further held that the character and conduct of a clergyman is a matter of public interest, not limited to the narrow circle of his parish, and the publication that action had been taken upon charges made against a clergyman in two of the church papers did not forfeit the protection of the privilege which the law affords.

It is contended that, by the general publication in the papers, the defamatory matter was circulated outside of the church members, and therefore the privilege was lost. The communication appears to have been made in good faith, and manifestly for members of the denomination alone. As has been seen, it was published only in church papers, and the fact that the publication may have incidentally been brought to the attention of others than members of the Church of Christ will not take away its privileged character. In Toogood v. Spyrring, 1 Cramp, M. & R. 181, it was held that publications made in good faith, in discharge of a public or private duty, are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society, and that the law does not restrict the privilege within any narrow limits. It was further remarked that "I am not aware that it was ever deemed essential to the protection of such a communication that it should be made to some person interested in the inquiry alone, and not in the presence of a third person." See also Farnsworth v. Storrs, 5 Cush. 412; Kelly v. Sherlock, L. R. 1 Q. B. 686, 689.

The objection that the matter privileged was not specifically pleaded is of no importance, since the defendants were not called upon to make a defense. The burden of proof, as we have seen, was upon the plaintiff to establish actual malice, and, having himself disproved malice, he failed to establish a liability against the defendants, and the case was rightfully taken from the jury. Kirkpatrick v. Eagle Lodge No. 32, 26 Kan. 384, 40 Am. Rep. 316.

The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to issue an execution upon a judgment which had been obtained by plaintiff against Thomas N. Rankin. Writ granted.

Hamilton recovered a judgment on a certain note and mortgage held by said Hamilton, and which had been sent to Ellsworth, Kansas, for collection, in the district court of Ellsworth county, Kansas, against one Thomas N. Rankin for the sum of $2,484.10, which said sum drew interest from the date of said judgment at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, and for the foreclosure of a mortgage on certain real estate in Ellsworth county, Kansas; that in May, 1890, the said real estate was duly sold under foreclosure proceedings, and the proceeds of the sale were applied to the payment of the judgment debt, leaving a balance due of $563.23; that on the 28th day of July, 1891, the clerk of the district court of Ellsworth county, Kansas, duly issued an execution to the sheriff of Ellsworth county, Kansas, for the purpose of collecting the balance due on the said judgment, and said execution was directed to the said sheriff to collect such balance out of the goods and chattels, and, for want of same, out of the real estate of the said Thomas N. Rankin; that said execution was duly received by the said sheriff, and was by him, on the 8th day of August, 1891, returned unsatisfied, having indorsed thereon a return that he could find no property of the said defendant; that thereafter, and on the 14th day of January, 1895, an execution was duly issued by the clerk of said district court of said Ellsworth county, and directed to the sheriff of said county, on said judgment, and directing the said sheriff to collect from the said Thomas N. Rankin the amount then due on the said judgment, which execution was returned by J. H. Hutchins, the then sheriff of said county, on the 14th day of March, 1895, with an indorsement thereon that he could find no goods and chattels and real estate of the said Thomas N. Rankin in said county; that thereafter, pursuant to the provisions of chapter 243 of the Session Laws of 1897 of the state of Kansas, relating to the taxation of judgments, the said judgment hereinbefore referred to, and being then of record in the district court of Ellsworth county, Kansas, was duly listed for taxation, and taxed in accordance with the provisions of the said act, and that there was a default in the payment of the said tax levied upon the said judgment, and said judgment was duly advertised for sale in manner and form as required by the provisions of said act, and was, according to the provisions of said act, duly sold to the highest and best bidder, and in the manner and form as required by the provisions of the said act of the legislature, and that at the said sale the said judgment was purchased by the said Thomas N. Rankin for the sum of $13.80, that sum being the full amount of all taxes and charges assessed and levied on and against said judgment; that thereafter a certificate, showing the tax sale of the said judgment, was duly issued, as required by the said act of the legislature, to the said Thomas N. Rankin, as the purchaser of the said judgment at the said sale; that thereafter, and on the 16th day of March, 1899, the said Thomas N. Rankin, as the owner of the said judgment by virtue of the said tax-sale proceedings hereinbefore recited, duly entered upon the records of the district court of Ellsworth county, Kansas, a release and discharge of the said judgment, and at the same time filed and left with the clerk of the said court the certificate before that time received by him showing that he had purchased the said judgment at said tax sale, which said certificate was then and there, by the said clerk of the said district court, filed as a part of the records of the office of the said clerk of the said district court, and still remains a part thereof; that the said Thomas N. Rankin does not own nor claim to any ownership in said judgment, or any right to release the same of record, except such ownership or right as he may have acquired by reason of the tax proceedings herein set forth. It is further admitted by the parties hereto, for the purposes of this action, that all of the proceedings had in reference to the listing, taxation, advertising, and sale of the said judgment and the purchasing of same were strictly in accordance with the provisions of the said act of the legislature hereinbefore referred to, and being chapter 243 of the Laws of 1897 of the state of Kansas. It is further expressly stipulated and agreed that, in the event that the said proceedings as hereinbefore recited do not, in law, operate as a release and discharge of the said judgment, said judgment has not otherwise been paid, released, or satisfied by the said Thomas N. Rankin or said plaintiff, or by anyone for or on his behalf and account. It is further agreed by the parties hereto that the said George A. Hamilton had no actual knowledge of any of the tax proceedings herein recited in relation to said judgment until after the said Thomas N. Rankin had released the judgment of record as herein stated under his claim of right to do under his said tax proceedings. It is further stipulated that on the 16th day of September, 1899, the said plaintiff, George A. Hamilton, by his attorneys, Harvey & Harvey, presented to the clerk of the district court of said Ellsworth county, James M. Wilson, a præcipe for an execution, which said præcipe was in due form as required by law, and demanded of the said clerk that an execution issue on the said judgment; that the said James M. Wilson, as said clerk of said court, by reason of the cancelation and discharge of the said judgment in the manner as hereinbefore set out, refused, and still refuses, to issue an execution on the said judgment; that on or about the 16th day of September, 1899, said plaintiff filed a motion in said district court in said action, moving said court to make an order directing the said James M. Wilson, as clerk of said court, to issue an execution on the said judgment in accordance with the præcipe filed as aforesaid, which said motion regularly coming on to be heard at the October term, 1899, of the said district court, the said court refused to consider or pass upon the said motion, although the said plaintiff was present, and demanded a hearing and consideration thereof; that the reason assigned by the said court in refusing to pass upon the said motion was that said court would not pass upon the validity of the said law taxing judgments in such a summary manner in said action, and would only pass upon same under proper mandamus proceedings."

Messrs. Harvey & Harvey and A. E. Maine for plaintiff.

Messrs. Ira E. Lloyd and N. F. Nourse, for defendant:

Chapter 243, Kan. Laws 1897, is not unconstitutional as violating § 1, art. 11, of the Constitution.

The purpose of the act, construing it as an entirety, is to tax personal judgments.

The evident purpose of the legislature was to put all personal judgments, whether owned by residents or nonresidents, upon the same footing, and to subject all such judgments to be taxed under the laws of this state.

The wisdom of such law is apparent. The nonresident seeks the benefit of our courts and the protection of our laws, but pays no taxes to the public.

Where the note and mortgage are in the hands of an agent and within the state, they are subject to taxation within the state.

Buck v. Miller, 147 Ind. 586, 37 L. R. A. 384, 45 N. E. 647, 47 N. E. 8; Detroit v. Lewis, 109 Mich. 155, 32 L. R. A. 439, 66 N. W. 958.

The reason of the authorities makes judgments rendered and existing wholly within the state, even though owned by nonresidents, taxable within the state.

Kingman County Comrs. v. Leonard, 57 Kan. 531, 34 L. R. A. 810, 46 Pac. 960.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Chapter 243 of the Laws of 1897, relating to the taxation of personal judgments, is attacked as unconstitutional. The first section of the law reads: "Section 1. The term 'personal judgments' shall include all personal judgments for money only, owned by residents and nonresidents of the state of Kansas: provided, this section shall not apply to judgments upon foreclosure of mortgages prior to the sale of the lands described in the decree, work and labor judgments, or for material furnished in the erection of buildings, and improvements on land or lots. But shall apply to all personal judgments rendered upon foreclosure of mortgage after sale when a deficiency judgment remains against the judgment debtor." It is particularly urged that the exemptions contained in said section violate the requirement of uniformity in assessment and taxation contained in § 1 of article 11 of the Constitution, as follows: "Section 1. The legislature shall provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation; but all property used exclusively for state, county, municipal, literary, educational, scientific, religious, benevolent, and charitable purposes, and personal property to the amount of at least two hundred dollars for each family, shall be exempted from taxation." It is evident that the prescribed rule of uniformity has been disregarded in the discriminations made between different classes of judgments mentioned in § 1 of the act. It is quite certain that the law in question was passed for other purposes than the production of revenue. This, however, would be an immaterial consideration if the taxing power had confined itself within constitutional limits. We know by common experience that judgments on debts secured by mortgages are of much greater value than deficiency judgments for the same amounts remaining over after the property upon which they were liens has been exhausted. Yet under this law such valuable judgments are wholly exempted, while judgments for deficiencies are taxed. Again, it is difficult to furnish a reason why, under a tax law requiring uniformity and equality in its operation, a judgment for material furnished in the erection of buildings should be exempted from taxation, while a judgment rendered for money borrowed to purchase the material so used should be taxed. Deficiency judgments remaining after the sale of real estate upon foreclosure of mortgages are subject to be taxed, but any deficiency arising on judgments in the case of the foreclosure of other liens, such as mechanics' or materialmen's liens, is wholly exempted. While it may be an unimportant inquiry, yet, reading the whole law together, it seems to have been enacted for the purpose of benefiting judgment debtors. By § 9, after a judgment has been advertised and offered for sale without bidders, the county treasurer is required to bid in the same in the name of the county. Thereafter the board of county commissioners is authorized to compromise the tax with the judgment debtors upon such terms and conditions as may be to the best interests of the county, thus restricting the power of the county commissioners to sell the judgment so held by the county, unless the judgment debtor shall see fit to purchase the same. Strangers to the judgment, or even the holder and owner of the same, cannot compromise the tax thereon with the county. Under the above constitutional provision the legislature has a narrow latitude in exempting property from taxation, and the extent of its departure from a uniform and equal rate of assessment and levy is marked out and circumscribed in express terms. This constitutional provision is to be regarded as a limitation on the power of the legislature to discriminate between different classes or kinds of property when enacting tax laws. In Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. p. 215, it is said: "It is difficult to conceive of a justifiable exemption law which should select single individuals or corporations, or single articles of property, and, taking them out of the class to which they belong, make them the subject of capricious legislative favor. Such favoritism could make no pretense of equality; it would lack the semblance of legitimate tax legislation." In the case of Re Page, 60 Kan. 842-847, 58 Pac. 478, this court passed upon the validity of a law providing for the taxation of contracts of insurance made with insurance companies not authorized to do business in this state. The tax was restricted in its operation to contracts with insurance companies not licensed here, and made no provision for taxing contracts with domestic companies, or companies authorized and licensed to carry on insurance in Kansas. The law was held void. Mr. Justice Johnston, speaking for the court, said: "The lack of uniformity is manifest in another way: One taxpayer has a policy written in the state by a company with authority on which no tax is imposed, while his neighbor has one written by an unlicensed company at Indianapolis, or other place outside of the state, which is subject to taxation. Taxes are uniform and equal when imposed on all property of the same character within the taxing district, and yet here the insured pays a 10 per cent tax upon a policy written outside of the state, while his neighbor pays nothing for a policy of equal value, and affording the same protection, because it is written within the state. . . . This is an invidious discrimination, purposely made, and is a distinct departure from the constitutional rule of uniformity." See the numerous authorities cited, and also Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 60 Kan. 826, 58 Pac. 477.

Much has been said by counsel for plaintiff regarding the situs of the judgment, it being owned by a citizen and resident of Iowa. We deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion of that question. For the purposes of the case we assume that the situs of the judgment is in this state. The act in question is void, and the sale of the judgment and its satisfaction by the judgment debtor unauthorized.

A peremptory writ of mandamus will be awarded.

ST. LOUIS, KANSAS, & SOUTHWESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

John W. NYCE et al.

(.....Kan.....)

*1. A railroad company obtained deeds from an owner of mortgaged land for a right of way across the same, and immediately constructed its roadbed, bridges, main line, and side tracks, together with a station house thereon. Thereafter an action was commenced by the mortgagee to foreclose his lien upon the real estate, in which suit the railroad company was made a party. It answered, setting up its deeds to the right of way, and averring that it was in possession of the strip of land by virtue of said conveyances from the owner. A decree was entered ordering a sale of the mortgaged property, and adjudging that the mortgage was a senior and paramount lien upon the land, including the right of way of the railroad company. A sale was ordered first of the land not embraced in the right of way, and, should that prove insufficient to satisfy the mortgage claim, then that the strip included in the right-of-way deeds be sold. The mortgagee bid in both tracts at less than his judgment, and received a sheriff's deed. The railroad company thereupon made application to the district judge for the appointment of commissioners to condemn the right of way then in use over and across the land. They were appointed. On the trial of an appeal from their award, held, that the purchaser at the sheriff's sale could not recover the value of the improvements placed upon the land by the railroad company, and that the same did not pass by the sheriff's deed as part of the real estate.

2. The case of Briggs v. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. 56 Kan. 526, 43 Pac. 1131, overruled.

3. Such purchaser at a foreclosure sale cannot recover damages caused to that part of the land outside of the right-of-way strip by reason of the construction or operation of the railroad.

4. Improvements placed upon real estate by a railroad company, necessary to the operation of the road, are to be regarded as trade fixtures, and not accessories of the land to which they are attached.

5. A railway corporation is, in one sense, a public agency. It possesses the sovereign power of eminent domain, conferred by reason of the benefits derived by the people of the state from the operation of the road. To permit a part of its roadbed and track to pass by sheriff's sale to an individual, with absolute dominion and ownership in the purchaser, would destroy it as an instrument of commerce, take away all power of regulation or control by the state, and divert it from the purposes for which it was built.

ERROR to the District Court for Sumner County to review a judgment in favor of petitioners in a proceeding brought to obtain compensation for land which had been obtained by defendant for right of way. Modified.

Statement by Smith, J.:

In March, 1886, Alexander Blackstone and wife executed to the Stock Exchange Bank a mortgage upon a half section of land to secure a note for about $4,500 given to the bank by Charles Blackstone, Alexander Blackstone, and William Corzine. The mortgage was duly recorded. On November 4 following, Alexander Blackstone and wife sold to the St. Louis, Kansas, & Southwestern Railroad Company a strip of land 100 feet wide through said land, and executed to the latter a warranty deed for the same, which was recorded December 14, 1886. Afterwards, in April, 1887, the railroad company acquired by another warranty deed from Blackstone and wife an additional right of way over said real estate, which last deed was recorded July 1, 1887. Immediately after acquiring said right of way and property by virtue of the two warranty deeds above mentioned, the railroad company constructed its track, roadbed, bridges, main line, and side tracks, and also built and constructed a depot and station house upon the land so granted. In October, 1887, an action was commenced by the Stock Exchange Bank to recover upon the note and to foreclose the mortgage executed to it by Alexander Blackstone and wife. Both the St. Louis, Kansas, & Southwestern Railroad Company and the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company (which latter company was then operating the road) were made parties defendant to the suit. The San Francisco Company filed an answer therein, setting up the deeds to said right of way. In May, 1888, a personal judgment was rendered against Charles and Alexander Blackstone and William Corzine in favor of the bank for the amount due upon the note, and a decree entered for the sale of the property covered by the mortgage at the expiration of six months, without appraisal. The cause was then continued as to the railway company. In December, 1889, the case came on for further hearing between the plaintiff bank and the railway company. It was then decreed that the mortgage of the bank was a senior and paramount lien upon all of said real estate, including the right of way of the railroad companies, but ordering that, upon the sale of the property mortgaged, the land not embraced in the right of way should be first sold and exhausted to satisfy the mortgagee's claim; and, in the event said sale should prove insufficient for that purpose, then the right of way should be sold, and barring the title and interest of the railroad companies in the property after such sale. On July 8, 1895, pursuant to the decree, the sheriff sold all of that portion of the land not embraced and included in the right of way to John W. Nyce for $1,000, and thereupon sold the right of way to John W. Nyce for $500. The sale was confirmed July 10 thereafter, and a sheriff's deed ordered. On July 27, 1895, the St. Louis, Kansas, & Southwestern Railroad Company made application to the district judge for the appointment of commissioners to condemn a right of way over and across said premises. Commissioners were appointed and qualified, and on December 3 filed their report, allowing damages to the land not taken $383.87, and value of land taken $245; making a total of $629.67. In the commissioners' report the owner is given as unknown. On September 13, 1895, John W. Nyce and the Stock Exchange Bank, claiming to be the owners of all of said tract of land, filed an appeal bond, and a transcript of the record was transmitted to the district court. Thereafter, in November, Nyce and the bank filed a petition in the district court against the railroad company, wherein they alleged they were the owners of the land, setting forth the condemnation proceedings and claiming damages in the sum of $9,000, consisting of the following items: A station house or depot, of the value of $1,000; 1,700 feet of side track, laid upon grade, consisting of wooden ties and steel rails, and the necessary switches and appliances, of the value of $2,000; a mile of main track, built and laid upon a grade, consisting of wooden ties and steel rails, of the value of $6,000. The defendant below, the St. Louis, Kansas, & Southwestern Railroad Company, filed an answer, setting up its 48 L. R. A.

ownership of the land conveyed to it for right of way in the deeds from Blackstone and wife, heretofore mentioned, and the erection of improvements thereon by the railroad company, and the continuous occupation and use of the same thereafter for railroad purposes. Upon the trial the jury were instructed that the plaintiffs, Nyce and the bank, had a right to recover the value of the improvements placed upon the land by the railroad company, in addition to the value of the land taken, as well as damages to the land not taken; and plaintiffs below recovered a verdict against the company for the sum of $4,851.17, upon which judgment was entered in their favor. In this amount $500 was included for depreciation in value of the land not occupied by the railroad by reason of the maintenance and operation of the same over and across the half section mentioned.

Messrs. Rossington, Smith, & Histed, for plaintiff in error:

The value of the property in these cases is of the date when the condemnation is had.

The improvements placed upon the right-of-way by the railroad company were not proper elements of damage.

A mortgagee has no standing in court to segregate his right from that of the mortgagor, and to appeal from the award.

When the railroad company attempted to condemn the strip of land it came as an absolute stranger in just the same position it would be in had it never before been in possession of the land. It became a trespasser on the land after the sale by remaining.

Murphy v. Welch, 128 Mass. 489.

The compensation for such right of way appropriated to the use of the company includes, not only the value of the property taken, but also the loss the landowner sustains in the value of his property by being deprived of a portion of it.

Reisner v. Atchison Union Depot & R. Co. 27 Kan. 382.

The grade, rails, ties, telegraph poles, and fences attached to the land by the railway company while it was the owner of the land, subject to the mortgage to the bank, became a part of the real estate, and, as such, passed to the purchaser at sheriff's sale, and he is entitled to their value as a part of his damages in a subsequent proceeding for condemnation of the land.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We will consider but two of the questions discussed by counsel for plaintiff in error in their brief and argument, viz.: (1) In estimating the amount of damages which the plaintiffs below were entitled to recover under the condemnation proceedings, can the value of the improvements put upon the land by the railroad company be taken into consideration? (2) Can the plaintiffs below recover damages to the land outside of the 48 L. R. A.

right of way of the railroad company by reason of the construction and operation of the road, the right of way and the land adjacent to it having been sold in separate tracts under the decree of foreclosure, and bid in by them at sheriff's sale long after the construction of the road. As the defendant in error Nyce and the Stock Exchange Bank appealed from the award made by the commissioners in condemnation, we will treat them, in the discussion of this case, as the owners of the property, although it appears from the record that Nyce alone purchased the property at the sheriff's sale. If the roadbed, ties, track, etc., placed upon the property by the railroad company are to be treated, under the circumstances of this case, as part of the real estate, then the position taken by the defendants in error on the first proposition (which was concurred in by the trial court) is the correct one; otherwise not. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider, in the outset, the nature of the improvements placed upon the land by the railroad company, and their character, as affected by the relations sustained towards the public by such companies. From early times it has been held that buildings adapted and used for the purposes of trade are recognized as an exception from the general rule which obtains as to buildings constructed for other purposes, in that the former do not become a part of the real estate, when affixed thereto, from the fact of their erection alone. This doctrine was announced by Lord Ellenborough in 1802, and later by the Supreme Court of the United States in Van Ness v. Pacard, 2 Pet. 137, 7 L. ed. 374. In the latter case the improvement was a large house, built and used as a family residence, and it was sought to have the question depend upon whether the building was removable or not; but the court held that the size of the building, whether it had a brick foundation or not, or was one or two stories high, or had a brick chimney, was immaterial; the sole consideration being whether or not it was designed for the purposes of trade. If so, it was a fixture, which might be severed and removed by the person erecting the same. This distinction was applied in the case of Wagner v. Cleveland & T. R. Co. 22 Ohio St. 563, 10 Am. Rep. 770. Stone piers were built by a railroad company on premises over which it was authorized to construct its road, and the question determined was whether they were so annexed to the land as to become the property of the owner of the land. The court held that the use of the strip of land on which the piers were built was granted to the railroad company for the purpose of constructing a part of a continuous line of railroad which it was authorized to build and operate. The piers were held to be as much a part of the road as the bridge they supported, or the rails or ties. The road was alone adapted for the transportation of persons or property. All its parts were merely accessory for its business, and were put on the land for this purpose, and not as accessories to the land over which the road was to pass. That part of the road built on the premises of the party plaintiff in error in the suit, disconnected from other parts of the road, could not be operated and would be useless as a railroad, nor could it serve any useful purpose as an appurtenance to the land on which it was built. It is said in the opinion: "The general principle to be kept in view, which underlies all questions of this kind, is the distinction between the business which is carried on in or upon the premises and the premises, or locus in quo. The former is personal in its nature, and articles that are merely accessory to the business, and have been put on the premises for this purpose, and not as accessions to the real estate, retain the personal character of the principal, to which they appropriately belong and are subservient. But articles which have been annexed to the premises as accessory to it, whatever business may be carried on upon it, and not peculiarly for the benefit of a present business, which may be of a temporary duration, become subservient to the realty, and acquire and retain its legal character. . . . The railroad company acquired an easement in the land to construct and use its road thereon. It did not bind itself to the landowner either to build or maintain the road, and it could change the character of the structure at pleasure. Nor do we perceive any good reason why, in the act of building, it should lose its right of property in the structure when built, or in the materials of which it was composed. The landowner retained his land subject to the easements, and the company owned the easement and the structure it was designed to support." Again, in Northern O. R. Co. v. Canton Co. 30 Md. 347, it was held that a railway came within the rule regarding trade-fixtures; that it was not an accessory to the enjoyment of the freehold, or in any manner necessary and convenient for the occupation of the land by the party entitled to the inheritance. The court said: "A railway is certainly quite as essential to the trade and business of a railway company as a steam engine and the house which may cover it, or any other fixture, can be to the miller or the miner. . . . Prima facie, a house, with its foundation planted in the soil, is real property; yet when it is accessory to trade, and in law a trade fixture, we find all the authorities regard it as personal property. The same doctrine is applicable to the railway in question." See also Western N. O. R. Co. v. Deal, 90 N. C. 110; Albion River R. Co. v. Hesser, 84 Cal. 435, 24 Pac. 288; Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Mosier, 14 Or. 519, 58 Am. Rep. 321, 13 Pac. 300; Jones v. New Orleans & S. R. Co. & Immigration Asso. 70 Ala. 227; Justice v. Nesquehoning Valley R. Co. 87 Pa. 28; Neugass v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. 54 Ark. 140, 15 S. W. 188.

The above cases are to the effect that, although a railway company may enter upon land without right, and construct its track thereon, it being possessed with the continuing power of eminent domain, and having the right to secure an easement on the land upon which it has laid its track for railroad purposes, the nature of its entry and the manner in which it annexes chattels to the soil distinguish it from the case of an ordinary trespasser making improvements to the freehold. In the case of Cohen v. St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. 34 Kan. 158-164, 54 Am. Rep. 242, 8 Pac. 142, a railroad company had taken possession of a strip of land, and constructed its track thereon, without any formal condemnation proceedings, and without procuring any title thereto, or easement therein, from the owner of the land. In an action brought by the latter against the railroad company to recover damages for the permanent taking and appropriation of such strip, no recovery was allowed for materials and work furnished by the railroad company itself and used in the construction of its track. In passing upon this question the court said: "This question, we think, must be answered in the negative. Of course, it must be admitted that where a mere wrongdoer—a naked trespasser—enters upon the land of another, and makes improvements thereon of a permanent character, such improvements become the property of the landowner; and this will apply to railroad companies as well as to others. If a railroad company should enter upon the land of another without any color of claim of right or privilege, as a mere wrongdoer,—a naked trespasser,—and construct a railroad track on such land, such railroad track would, of course, become the property of the landowner. . . . But neither the foregoing principles nor the above authorities apply to the present case. The railroad company in the present case was not a wrongdoer nor a trespasser in any sense. It was a duly-organized railroad company under the laws of Kansas, and had a right to build its railroad across the plaintiff's land, provided, of course, that it first procured the right of way from the owner of the land; and it had the right to procure such right of way by condemnation proceedings, as the representative of the sovereign authority, the state of Kansas; for the operation of a railroad is everywhere considered and held to be a public purpose, and the statutes of Kansas authorize such condemnation proceedings. And the railroad company took possession of the land for its right of way, and appropriated the same to its own use, with the consent of the only person who had possession of the land, and the only person who seemed at the time to be the owner thereof. This person was B. F. Files. He had the unquestioned possession of the land, and claimed title thereto, and claimed the land as his own. He had tax deeds on all the land through which the defendant's railroad was constructed. . . . Nor has the plaintiff treated the railroad company as a trespasser. He has allowed the company to retain its right of way as a permanent easement, and simply sues it for compensation and damages. . . . Under such circumstances, the railroad company will not be required to pay for the improvements which it itself made upon the land, but will be required to pay only the value of the strip of land which it appropriated, and the damages to the other land; and this value and these damages will be computed as of the time when the railroad company first took possession of said strip, and occupied the same as its right of way. This, we think, is founded in reason, and sustained by the weight of authority. [Citing authorities.] . . . It has even been held that, where a railroad company enters upon land as a technical trespasser, and afterwards procures the land for its right of way by condemnation proceedings, it is not compelled to pay for the improvements which it itself made upon the land while it was technically a trespasser, and before it legally procured its right of way. Justice v. Nesquehoning R. Co. 87 Pa. 28; Daniels v. Chicago, I. & N. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 52; Lyon v. Green Bay & M. R. Co. 42 Wis. 538; Greve v. First Div. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. 26 Minn. 66, 1 N. W. 816. This seems like justice; but, whether it is or not, surely where a railroad company enters upon a piece of land for the purpose of constructing a railroad track, and does so under the honest belief that it has a right to do so, and expends thousands of dollars thereon under such belief, and no person objects to its occupancy, or questions its right, while it is expending its money making improvements on the land, and where the paramount owner of the land afterwards treats the railroad company, not as a trespasser upon his land, but as a party which has in fact procured a permanent right of way over the land, and upon said theory sues the railroad company merely for the damages resulting from the permanent taking of the right of way, including the value of the land taken, and the permanent damages to his other property, he cannot say that the railroad company was at any time a mere trespasser; and he can recover only for the value of the land taken, and the damages to that not taken at the time when the railroad company first entered upon his land, and occupied the same for the purpose of procuring a right of way." In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan, 42 Kan. 23, 4 L. R. A. 284, 21 Pac. 809, the railroad company dug a well, and put in a pump and boiler for the purpose of filling a water tank on the line of its road, believing that the well and its attachments were upon its own property. When it was discovered that the same were upon the land of another, it was held that the pump and boiler could be removed without paying the owner of the land therefor. The court said: "It can readily be seen that one of the tests of whether a chattel retains its character or becomes a fixture is the uses to which it is put. . . . If the company had placed it there, even under a mistake, for the purpose of ultimately improving the real estate, the law might, under this state of facts, have held it to be the property of the owner of the real estate; but under the agreed statement it was placed there solely for the purpose of better operating its own railroad. . . . We believe, in this action, because the improvements did not and were not intended to benefit the realty, that the pump, boiler, and building should be held to be personal property, and not fixtures." In the case at bar the railroad company did not proceed to the laying down of its track and the erection of improvements mentioned, until after it had obtained a deed from Blackstone, the owner of the fee in the land. The mortgage held by the bank conveyed no estate, but was merely a lien. The mortgagee was in no sense the owner of the property, and in condemnation proceedings no personal notice was required to be served upon him, nor need he be named in the award. If condemnation had been had before the foreclosure, his rights as mortgagee would have received no consideration, and the value of the ties, track, etc., would have been wholly excluded from the amount of the award. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Sheldon, 53 Kan. 109, 35 Pac. 1105.

It is provided in § 7 of chapter 68 of the General Statutes of 1897, relating to the exercise of the right of eminent domain by railroad companies, that proceedings in condemnation may be commenced by a railway corporation after the road has been constructed; and such course was adopted in this case. Had the condemnation been had before the sale of the property under the decree and foreclosure, the value of the improvements upon the land would certainly not have entered into the estimate of the damages incurred by the owner, and the mortgagee by no possibility could have laid claim to them, or any part thereof. The improvements made did not become a part of the security under the mortgage, because they did not go to the betterment of the mortgagor's estate. In the case of Ritchie v. Kansas, N. & D. R. Co. 55 Kan. 38-59, 39 Pac. 725, the railroad company took possession of a piece of land conveyed to it on express conditions which it did not perform. By reason of the breach it was held that the land should revert to the owner. Mr. Justice Allen, in speaking for the court, said: "If the defendants desire to maintain a railroad across the lands, and to continue the use thereof for railroad purposes, they should be permitted to retain the land, and also the improvements they have constructed thereon, on payment of the value of the land computed as of the date of the commencement of this action, with interest since that time, without any charge on account of improvements made by the defendant thereon. Cohen v. St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. 34 Kan. 158, 54 Am. Rep. 242, 8 Pac. 138." Upon another ground also property rights in the improvements made by the railway company upon its right of way, to the extent claimed by the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, must be denied to the latter. The case in the court below proceeded upon the theory that Nyce, by virtue of his sheriff's deed, took such title as the mortgagor (Blackstone) had at the time the mortgage was executed, and this title carried with it the betterments added to the land, put there by the railroad company. If he took title to the extent claimed, then the exclusive estate in and dominion over the land and its improvements were vested in him absolutely, with the resulting power, necessarily accompanying such title and dominion, to exclude all persons from the land so purchased, and to use and enjoy the same unmolested by the railroad company in any way. As the owner of such an estate, he appeared as plaintiff in the court below, and was treated by that tribunal accordingly. If the contention of defendants in error be sustained, then his power over what he claimed was his own carried with it the right to fence his land, excluding all persons therefrom, as well as the servants of the railroad company, to stop the running of trains over his property by removing the track and ties, or by any other means. It must be remembered that a railroad is a public highway. The land over which it runs it holds under a franchise for a particular use conferred upon it by the state for public purposes. A railroad company is endowed with the sovereign power of eminent domain by reason of the benefits which the public at large derive from the operation of the road. It was said by Mr. Justice Allen in State ex rel. Maylor v. Dodge City, M. & T. R. Co. 53 Kan. 377, 378, 36 Pac. 747: "From this [public] use neither the corporation itself, nor any person, company, or corporation deriving its title by purchase either at voluntary or judicial sale, can divert it without the assent of the state." In the case of Georgia v. Atlantic & G. R. Co. 3 Woods, 434, Fed. Cas. No. 5,351, the question was considered whether an execution creditor of a railroad company might levy upon and sell its depots, freight houses, etc., in satisfaction of the debt. In denying such right, Mr. Justice Bradley said: "It is the means of communication between one part of the country and another. The interest which the public has in it is greater and more important than the interest which the company has in it. It cannot be supposed that the legislature, in authorizing its construction, and granting peculiar franchises for its operation and use, ever intended that execution creditors might levy upon parcels of it, and cut it up into sections, and destroy it as a great public thoroughfare. Such a supposition seems to us preposterous. Suppose a mile of the road should be levied on and sold, would the purchaser have a right to fence it in, and take up the rails and cross-ties, and plant it, and thereby destroy the railroad? Could this be done without condemning the power of the state by which it was created and made a public highway? We think not. . . . To sell it in parcels would be to sever an artery of commerce. It would affect the whole state in a vital part. Its public means of intercommunication are essential to the prosperity of the people. They are the most efficient appliances of modern civilization." In Justice v. Nesquehoning Valley R. Co. 87 Pa. 28, a railroad company was a trespasser, and its entry upon land not in conformity with law. In holding that the irregular proceedings did not operate as a dedication to the landowner of the property of the company placed on the land so as to enable the owner to receive the value of the improvements, the court, through Chief Justice Agnew, said: "This is not the case of a mere trespass by one having no authority to enter, but of one representing the state herself, clothed with the power of eminent domain, having a right to enter and to place these materials on the land taken for a public use,—materials essential to the very purpose which the state has declared in the grant of the charter. It is true, the entry was a trespass, by reason of the omission to do an act required for the security of the citizen, to wit, to make compensation or give security for it. For this injury the citizen is entitled to redress. But his redress cannot extend beyond his injury. It cannot extend to taking the personal chattels of the railroad company. They are not his, and cannot increase his remedy. The injury was to what the landholder had himself, not to what he had not. Then why should the materials laid down for the benefit of the public be treated as dedicated to him?"

There has been an attempt made by counsel to distinguish the case of Briggs v. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. 56 Kan. 526, 43 Pac. 1131, from the case at bar. We are not impressed by their efforts in that direction. The facts in the two cases are remarkably similar. The decision in the Briggs Case is founded upon the following statement: In 1886, Ault and wife were the owners of a lot upon which they had executed a mortgage. In 1887 they conveyed to the railway company a right of way over the property. In 1889 a foreclosure suit was commenced by the mortgagee, in which the railroad company was made a party. It answered, setting up a right to occupy a strip of land 300 feet in width by virtue of a deed from the Aults. Judgment was rendered against the Aults for the amount of the mortgage debt and interest, and the whole tract decreed to be sold to pay the same. The cause was then continued as between the mortgagee, plaintiff in the suit, and the railroad company. Thereupon it was decreed that the railroad company be forever barred, foreclosed, enjoined, and cut off from claiming any interest or estate in or to the real estate, or any part thereof. An order of sale was issued, under which the land outside of the right-of-way strip was first sold for the sum of $50 to James F. Briggs as administrator, and the strip was then bid off by him for $100. A few days after the execution of the sheriff's deed to Briggs, the railroad company made application to the district judge for the appointment of commissioners to condemn a right of way over and across the premises. They were appointed, and proceeded in the usual way, allowing $124 for the land occupied and $30 damages to the remainder of the tract. No mention was made of any improvements. Briggs, as administrator and owner of the land, appealed from the award.

The trial court allowed the appellant $124 and $30, respectively, denying him the right to recover the value of the improvements, amounting to over $2,000. It will be seen that the proceedings had were almost identical with those in the case at bar, and the title of Briggs the same as the title of the defendants in error here. In the opinion in that case Mr. Chief Justice Martin, while asserting that the structures placed upon the right of way were real property, in fact based the decision upon the ground that the company had been barred and cut off by the decree in foreclosure from any interest in the lot, which included the structures. He said: "Unless, therefore, we may judicially declare that these buildings and structures were not and are not real estate, we must hold that they passed by the sheriff's deed to the purchaser at the sale." We cannot adhere to the conclusion reached in that decision. While it appears that all the justices concurred, yet on the application for a rehearing Mr. Justice Johnston favored the granting of the same, as appears by the record in the case. We think it should have been declared judicially that the buildings and structures were not real estate, and that the decree in the foreclosure suit did not give to Briggs the right to recover for the improvements. In that case, as in this, the question as to whether the ties, rails, and other structures upon the right of way were real estate or personal property was not presented to, considered, or decided by the court in the foreclosure suit. There was no issue upon that question, and no adjudication thereon. It cannot be asserted that the materials placed upon the land were changed from personal to real property by the foreclosure proceeding. In the case at bar the answer of the railway company in the foreclosure action averred that it was in possession of a strip of land 100 feet wide across the land, and also another strip 100 feet wide and 1,700 feet long, adjoining the right of way, obtained for the purpose of depot, side track, and yard, which land was obtained by deed from Alexander Blackstone, the owner thereof. There was no reference in the pleadings to the improvements upon the land, other than might be implied from the averments in the answer of the railway company that it was in possession of the strip of land above mentioned. The litigation in both foreclosure cases related to the fixing of a mortgage lien upon the real estate, and the decrees went no further than that. If the structures placed upon the property by the railroad company were a part of the real estate before the foreclosure, they were a part of it afterwards, for there was nothing in the decrees changing its character. We are not without authority as to the effect of a judgment in foreclosure upon the rights of the parties. In the case of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hays, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Wilson), 79, before the commencement of condemnation proceedings the landowner had recovered a judgment against the railroad company in an action of ejectment to quiet title to the real estate. In the condemnation proceeding it was contended that the company was estopped by the judgment from claiming the material composing that part of the railroad on the land in question. This claim was denied, the court holding that the judgment in ejectment gave to the owner of the land the title to the easement or right of way which the railroad company was using, and was a trespasser thereon, yet the title to the fixtures and superstructure, although placed upon the land by the company without authority, did not become a part of the land; that the question as to what were fixtures was not involved in the decision of the ejectment suit, and that the plea of res judicata could not be interposed. In St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. v. Willard, 61 Vt. 134, 2 L. R. A. 528, 17 Atl. 38, certain land, at the time of the construction of a railroad, was encumbered by a mortgage, which was afterwards foreclosed, the railroad company being a party. The land was sold to Willard. In condemnation proceedings which were then instituted by the railway company he claimed that the latter was estopped by the judgment in the foreclosure suit from claiming the railroad, or the materials thereof. This claim was denied, and the improvements held to be personal property. The court said: "He [the defendant] also claims that the Essex County Company was a trespasser when it entered and constructed its road, and invoked the doctrine of the common law that structures placed upon land by a trespasser inure to the benefit of the owner of the land. But the company was not a trespasser as to either the mortgagor or the mortgagee. Not as to the mortgagor, for he consented to the entry and construction of the road. Not as to the mortgagee, for, as to third persons, a mortgagor in possession is regarded as the owner, and the mortgagee as having only a lien or security. . . . The effect of the decree of foreclosure was to cut off the right of redemption, and thereby convert defendant's conditional title into an absolute title; but in other respects the rights of the parties were left to be determined by the deed." In Kennedy v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 22 Wis. 581-587, the liability of a railway company entering upon mortgaged lands to the mortgagee was considered. Cole, J., in the opinion, says: "When the company obtained the right of way, it could not assume that the mortgage would not be paid by those under obligation to pay it. Of course, it incurred the risk that it might ultimately be enforced against the mortgaged premises. But, in the event it should be enforced, it seems to us that all equity requires the company to do is to make compensation by paying the value of the land at the time it was taken, and interest on that amount. This appears to us more just and equitable than to say that there should be no apportionment of the lien, but that the holder of the mortgage may enforce it to the full amount of his debt by selling the road track, superstructure, and fixtures placed upon the land at great expense by the company. . . . But when the company has purchased the right of way, and neglected to have a mortgage lien discharged, so that it has to make further compensation, then we think it ought only to pay the value when taken, and interest upon that sum." In the case of Northern O. R. Co. v. Canton Co. 30 Md. 347, a railway was built on the lands of the Canton Company, with a license so to do. The license was revoked, and this was followed by two suits; one in ejectment, and the other of trespass quare clausum fregit. Judgment was recovered in both actions. A subsequent action of ejectment was brought for the roadbed, judgment obtained, and under a writ possession was delivered to the plaintiff in the suit. The rails and other materials which formed a part of the railway constructed by the appellant were upon the land at the time, and the question arose who was the rightful owner of them. It was held that they were trade fixtures, and, no matter how strongly attached to the soil, were to be treated as personal property. The court said: "If the property replevied did not belong to the appellee at the time the license to the appellant to be upon its land was revoked, it is not perceived how the subsequent suits between them could have changed the title to it. This property was not the subject of those suits. They had reference to the land only upon which it was, and determined no question of its ownership, inasmuch as it does not pass with the realty from the single circumstance of having been affixed to the soil." See also Winslow v. Bromich, 54 Kan. 300, 38 Pac. 275. It is well settled that, where a railroad company commences condemnation proceedings after being in possession of the land sought to be taken for right of way, it is only required to pay for the land, and not for the improvements it has placed thereon. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan, 42 Kan. 23, 4 L. R. A. 284, 21 Pac. 809; San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. Taylor, 80 Cal. 246, 24 Pac. 1027; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Dickson, 63 Miss. 380, 56 Am. Rep. 809; Canton, A. & N. R. Co. v. French, 68 Miss. 22, 8 So. 512; Greve v. First Div. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. 26 Minn. 66, 1 N. W. 816; *Ritchie v. Kansas, N. & D. R. A. 533, 10 So. 465; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Goodwin, 111 Ill. 273, 53 Am. Rep. 622. After much consideration, we are convinced that the decision in Briggs v. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. is contrary to established principles settled by a great number of well-considered cases involving the same question. So far as that decision is based upon argument, we think it fails in reason, and, when sought to be sustained upon precedent, lacks authority. While the doctrine stare decisis has been adhered to by this court with much pertinacity, yet we shall not hesitate to incur the accusation of instability by overturning a rule previously adopted, when it is contrary to right reason, and the foundation of which is shattered by the pressing weight of opposing authority.

On the second proposition stated at the beginning of this opinion it is quite clear that the plaintiffs below cannot recover damages to the land outside of the right of way by reason of the construction and operation of the railroad. Under the terms of the decree in the foreclosure suit, the half section outside of the strip of land deeded for right of way purposes by Blackstone and wife to the railroad company was first sold by the sheriff, and bought in by Nyce, and afterwards he purchased the right-of-way strip. When he purchased, the road was in operation. Embankments had been thrown up, ties and track laid, the road fully completed, and trains were running over the land. He bought the property with the disadvantage of the railroad upon it. The former owner was the person who might have recovered for the depreciation in value of the property caused by the construction of the railroad, and the right of action was in him. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Loeb, 118 Ill. 203, 59 Am. Rep. 341, 8 N. E. 460. The general rule is stated in the case of Colorado Midland R. Co. v. Trewarthen, 1 Colo. App. 152, 153, 27 Pac. 1013, as follows: "It is the law of this state that a lotowner can only recover for those damages which he has sustained from the construction or operation of a road subsequent to the time when he acquired his title to the property. If the road has been constructed, and is in operation at the time he gets title, he is supposed to have taken it cum onere, and to have paid the lesser price because of the disadvantages. The damages arising from the construction inure to the holder of the fee, and do not pass by the deed which transfers the title." In the case of Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, 100 Ind. 400-414, a farm, at the time a railroad was constructed over it, was owned by one Brittingham, who afterwards sold and conveyed the same to Allen. The latter then conveyed the farm, except the strip of land within the right of way, and reserved to himself "all right of action of every kind and nature against the railroad company, . . . and all right to prosecute proceedings for the assessment of damages for the taking and occupancy of said premises, or any part thereof, by said company for the use of its railroad, and the right to all damages done to said premises by reason of such taking and occupancy" to one Fields. The railroad company then instituted condemnation proceedings, in which Allen claimed damages to the land outside of the right of way. In denying this claim the court said: "Upon this testimony we think it appears clearly that the appellee was not entitled to any damages for the strip of land taken, or for the injury done to the remainder of the quarter section. When he bought the quarter section, the railroad was upon it. It is fair to presume that the existence of such an encumbrance affected the price paid. When the strip of land was taken, the quarter section belonged to Martha E. Brittingham; the right to recover all the damages then belonged to her. That right was a chose in action. It did not pass to appellees by the warranty deed from Mrs. Brittingham and her husband. No assignment is alleged, and the rule is that damages to land remaining uncollected do not pass to a vendee." See also Sennott v. St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. 59 Vt. 226, 9 Atl. 554; Livermon v. Roanoke & T. River R. Co. 109 N. C. 52, 13 S. E. 734; Dows v. Congdon, 16 How. Pr. 571; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Muhlman, 17 Kan. 224.

The defendants in error were entitled to recover only the value of the land occupied by the railroad, irrespective of the improvements. In the particular questions of fact answered by the jury, this was found to be $164.

The judgment of the court below will be modified, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the defendants in error for that amount. The costs of this court will be divided between the parties.

*The statute (Laws 1897, chap. 167) being "An Act to Require Railroad Companies to Furnish Free Transportation to Shippers of Stock in Certain Cases," etc., is a deprivation of property without due process of law, and a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and is therefore unconstitutional and void, under the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

(February 10, 1900.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals, Southern Department, Central Division, affirming a judgment of the District Court for Sedgwick County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the price paid for transportation over defendant's road in violation of a statute giving plaintiff the right to free transportation because returning from accompanying stock shipped by him over the road. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. A. Hurd, W. Littlefield, and O. J. Wood, for plaintiff in error:

It costs the railroad company no more to haul the shipper to the point of destination, per hundred, than it does the cattle. He has no better or more expensive accommodations. In this case it cost the company 40 cents, and no more, probably much less, to carry the shipper from Attica to Kansas City. How shall he get back home? If he does not choose to walk he must take passage on the only railroad that will carry him back to Attica. For this the railroad charges him and compels him to pay $8.75.

The railroad companies, prior to the enactment of this law, had a way of compelling a certain class of people to patronize their passenger trains. Was this justice? Ought such conditions to be permitted to exist?

This statute in no sense attempts to fix a rate.

If a law applying to all railroads within the state, and to all shippers of live stock alike, is class legislation, then this is. Such legislation is proper, and has been so recognized by the courts of this and every other state.

Doster, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by the defendant in error, as plaintiff, against the plaintiff in error, as defendant, to recover an amount of money paid as passenger fare on the line of the road of plaintiff in error from Kansas City, Kansas, to Attica, Kansas. The defendant in error shipped a car load of live stock from the point last named to the one first named. On the going trip he rode free upon a stock shipper's contract issued to him by the railroad company's agent at the shipping point. Upon the return trip he demanded to be carried free, in accordance with the provisions of chapter 167, Laws 1897. This demand was refused, and, to avoid ejection from the train, he paid the required fare. He then brought an action to recover the amount paid, together with an attorney's fee for the prosecution of the suit. Judgment was rendered in his favor, first by a justice of the peace, next by the district court, and lastly by the court of appeals. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Campbell, 8 Kan. App. 661, 56 Pac. 509. The railroad company has prosecuted error to this court. The sole question involved in the case is the constitutionality of the legislative enactment under which the demand for free transportation was made. The title of the act and its first two sections (the only ones material to quote) read as follows:

"An Act to Amend Chapter 195 of the Laws of 1895, being An Act Entitled, 'An Act to Require Railroad Companies to Furnish Free Transportation to Shippers of Stock in Certain Cases, and Providing a Remedy in Case of Failure or Refusal on the Part of the Railroad Company to Comply with the Provisions of This Act,' to Provide a Penalty for the Violation of the Provisions of This Act, and Repealing All Acts and Parts of Acts in Conflict Herewith.

"Sec. 1. That section 1 of chapter 195 of the Laws of 1895 be amended so as to read as follows: 'Section 1. Whenever any railroad company or corporation, doing business within the limits of this state, shall receive and ship any live stock by the car-load, said company, in consideration of the usual price paid for the shipment of said car, shall pass the shipper or his employee to and from the point designated in the contract or bill of lading, without further expense to the shipper in the way of fare: provided, however, that in all cases where a shipper ships more than one car-load of stock at the same time the said railroad company shall be and is hereby required to pass free, as aforesaid, only one additional person, shipper, or employee, for every three car-loads shipped in addition to the first car-load.'

"Sec. 2. That section 2 of said chapter 195, Laws of 1895, is hereby amended so as to read: 'Sec. 2. Every railroad company or corporation failing or refusing to comply with the provisions of section one of this act, shall be liable in damages to the shipper for the amount of damages sustained by reason of such failure or refusal on the part of the railroad company, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction, and any judgment recovered on any such action shall be made to cover reasonable attorney's fees for plaintiff's attorney."

The above act is assailed upon the ground of its repugnancy to that portion of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which reads, "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Speaking for myself, I am of the opinion that a strained and artificial construction has been often placed upon this constitutional provision, especially by the Federal courts, for the purpose of bringing within its prohibitive terms much wholesome state legislation. For instance, I do not believe that the word "person," used in the clause above quoted, was designed to include corporations; nor that it can, in reason, bear that signification when read in connection with the preceding clauses of the section, and interpreted in the historic light of the origin and purpose of the amendment. However, the Federal courts, the authoritative expositors of the Federal Constitution, departing from the view first taken by them, have been for many years holding that a corporation was a "person," within the meaning of the provision above quoted. Those decisions are, of course, binding upon the state courts. Being, therefore, under the compulsion of the now settled rule of interpretation, I agree with my associates that the above-quoted enactment cannot be upheld. It operates as a deprivation of property without due process of law, and is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. The property of a railroad company consists, not alone in its franchise to be a corporation, nor its right of way and track, nor its rolling stock and other tangible property, but it consists, in its most essential character and important sense, in the right to charge and collect tolls for the transportation of persons and property over its line. Without the right to take tolls, each corporation could not do business; and a denial of its right to take tolls would as effectually render valueless all of its other property as a confiscation of its other property would defeat its ability to carry on its business. Upon the conception of the right to take tolls, as a species of property belonging to railroad corporations, rest all the decisions of all the courts, both state and Federal, denying the right of state legislatures to restrict such tolls below a reasonable amount. It needs but a glance at the act in question, and but a moment's thought over the consequences to result from a sanction of its provisions, to perceive that it strikes vitally at the fundamental right of a railroad company to own and enjoy that species of property which exists in the form of its franchise to charge and collect tolls. It purports in its title to be, and is, "An Act to Require Railroad Companies to Furnish Free Transportation to Shippers of Stock in Certain Cases;" and in its body it requires railroad companies, "in consideration of the usual price paid for the shipment of a car of stock, to pass the shipper or his employee to and from the point designated in the contract or bill of lading, without further expense to the shipper in the way of fare." Upon no theory whatever, consistent with the idea that the franchise of railroad companies to take tolls is a species of property, or consistent with the adjudications of the courts that such right of property is protected by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, can such an enactment be upheld. Once grant that so much of the property of railroad companies as is involved in their right to charge passenger fare to shippers of stock can be taken away by legislative enactment, and it necessarily follows that the like property of theirs which consists in their right to charge passenger fare to other shippers of other kinds of property can also be taken away for like reasons; and once grant, upon like considerations, that the property right of railroad companies to take tolls for passenger carriage can be thus taken away, and the right to take tolls for freight transportation can be likewise taken away; and once grant that the right to take tolls for freight and passenger carriage can be taken away, and it follows that the right to own and possess the rolling stock and other like property necessary to the operation of the road can be likewise taken away. In short, there would be no end to the extension of legislative authority over the right of railroad companies to own and enjoy property. It would be no answer to say that the enforcement of the act in question would not sufficiently impair the property right of the companies to take tolls as to be substantially detrimental to their interests. Rights are not measured or ascertained by the extent of the injury resulting from their impairment or denial. They do not cease to exist merely because the hurt to them may be slight. Rights reside in principles, and not in the physical ability of the claimant of rights to do without a minor portion of them.

Again speaking for myself, I am a firm believer in the right of the legislature of this state, under the reserved power of the Constitution (art. 12, § 1), to amend or add to the original acts providing for the incorporation of companies, and to amend or add to the original body of laws governing them, without declaring its enactments to be amendatory in character. However, its power of amendment in such cases is limited to such enactments as do not substantially impair the vested rights of the corporation. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 675. I therefore agree with my associates that the act in question, even if to be regarded as an exercise of the reserved power of the legislature to amend the charter of railroad corporations, is a substantial impairment of their vested rights. We do not mean to say that the legislature is powerless to declare circumstances or prescribe conditions under which railroad companies may be required to furnish transportation to shippers of live stock or other merchandise over their lines. However, those circumstances or conditions, if declared or prescribed, must exist in the form of considerations or equivalents for the transportation furnished. It may be that railroad companies can be compelled to carry patrons of their lines for some other consideration than cash fares. To illustrate, but only to illustrate, not to decide, it may be that a legislative enactment which imposed upon shippers of live stock the obligation to care for their stock en route, and to that extent to relieve the trainmen of the burden of its care, and which required the company to transport the shipper free, as an equivalent for his relief of the train employees in the way stated, would be constitutionally valid,—would not be a taking of private property without compensation. But the enactment in question does not provide for the equivalent of labor performed for transportation furnished. It declares that the transportation shall be furnished “in consideration of the usual price paid for the shipment of said car.” What the railroad company is required to do is not required of it as a compensation for anything to be done for it by the shipper, but is required of it in the form of a gratuity over and above the usual and ordinary charges for transportation. The enactment is not framed upon the assumption that the usual price paid for the shipment of live stock is excessive, to the extent of the passenger carriage of the shipper to and from the place of shipment, and that in order to make good the excess the shipper shall be transported free, but it is framed upon the assumption that the charge for the transportation of the car of stock is a reasonable one.

The brief of counsel for defendant in error suggests the importance of the shipper accompanying his stock in order to care for it en route. We do not judicially know that it is important or advantageous to the shipper or to the company for the former to accompany his stock to market, nor does the act assume the importance or advantage either to the shipper or the company in the former accompanying the stock. It imposes upon him no such requirement. So far as the act is concerned, he may accompany his stock, or he may ride upon another train. There is nothing whatever in the act from which an idea of obligation upon the part of the shipper to pay or perform anything as an equivalent for his transportation can be derived. However, turning to the shipping contract made by the defendant in error, we perceive in it certain stipulations imposing upon him the obligation to accompany and care for his stock, but this contract is no part of the statute in question. The statute does not purport to be framed upon the assumption that such contracts are or will be entered into between railroad companies and shippers of live stock. The contract is apart from the statute. None of its provisions are included within the terms of the statute. In short, there is no theory upon which this act can be upheld, and therefore we are constrained to hold it to be unconstitutional and void. No cases of a like character have been brought to our attention, except that of Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 43 L. ed. 858, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 505. That case involved the validity of an act of the legislature of Michigan requiring railroad companies to keep for sale 1,000-mile tickets, at specified rates, less than the regular rates, to be issued in the name of the purchaser and the members of his family, and to be good for use for two years from the date of sale. Commenting upon this enactment, the court said: “If the legislature can interfere by directing the sale of tickets at less than the generally-established rate, it can compel the company to carry certain persons or classes free. If the maximum rates are too high, in the judgment of the legislature, it may lower them, provided they do not make them unreasonably low, as that term is understood in the law; but it cannot enact a law making maximum rates, and then proceed to make exceptions to it in favor of such persons or classes as in the legislative judgment or caprice may seem proper. What right has the legislature to take from the company the compensation it would otherwise receive for the use of its property in transporting an individual or classes of persons over its road, and compel it to transport them free, or for a less sum than is provided for by the general law? Does not such an act, if enforced, take the property of the company without due process of law? We are convinced that the legislature cannot thus interfere with the conduct of the affairs of corporations.”

The judgment of the Court of Appeals and of the District Court are reversed, and the latter court is directed to enter judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff in error in this court.

defendant may be rearrested and held for trial.

2. Where the record of the trial of a criminal case shows that the jury "were absent some time considering of their verdict," and upon being returned to the jury box the foreman, in reply to an inquiry by the court, stated, in the presence of the remainder of the jury and without dissent by any of them, that there was no probability of their agreeing upon a verdict, and the court thereupon discharged them, "because they were unable to agree upon a verdict."—Held, that such record does not show an arbitrary or unreasonable exercise of the court's authority in discharging the jury, but does show facts from which a presumption of a correct exercise of judicial authority arises, and that it will not support a plea of former jeopardy when the defendant is again put upon trial.

(February 10, 1900.)

APPREAL by the state from a ruling of the District Court for Jackson County in favor of defendant upon a plea of former jeopardy to an indictment for larceny. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hayden & Hayden and H. F. Graham, for appellant:

It was not necessary to have the defendant's consent to a discharge of the jury.

Jones v. Com. 86 Va. 661, 10 S. E. 1004.

The length of time a jury should be kept together, and the improbability of an agreement, must be determined by the trial court from the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and its discretion will be conclusive unless it has abused its discretion in that regard.

State v. Allen, 59 Kan. 758, 54 Pac. 1060.

In interrogating the jury and making its determination from the answers received, the court was acting on an official report made by the jury, and one which the defendant has no right to question.

The necessity of the discharge of a jury is a matter within the discretion of the trial judge.

Messrs. Crame & Woodburn and J. A. Rokes, for appellee:

The defendant was not called upon to object in advance to the discharge of the jury. Whitten v. State, 61 Miss. 717.

The facts on which the finding of the trial court is based, as well as the finding itself, must appear on the record.

Dexter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the state upon a question reserved by it. The defendant in the court below interposed a plea of former jeopardy, which, upon hearing and consideration by the court, was sustained, and an order made for his discharge. The defendant had been informed against for grand larceny. Upon the trial of his case the jury reported they were unable to agree, whereupon they were discharged from further consideration of the case. The action was continued to the next succeeding term, and at that term the defendant filed his plea of former jeopardy. In this plea he alleged that, at the trial of his case the preceding term, "the jury were arbitrarily discharged, without a verdict, from the consideration of the case, and without any sufficient or lawful reason therefor, to which discharge defendant excepted, and, having once been in jeopardy, he cannot again be placed upon trial." The evidence in support of this plea was, of course, the record of the former proceeding. The material portion of the record was as follows: "The said jury retired in charge of a sworn bailiff to consider of their verdict; and, after being absent some time in consideration of their verdict, they were duly returned to the jury box, and the court duly inquired of the foreman whether they had agreed upon a verdict, and was informed by said foreman that they had not. The court then inquired of said foreman, 'Is there any probability of your doing so?' and was answered by said foreman, 'There is not.' The jury was by the court thereupon discharged from the further consideration of the cause, because they were unable to agree upon a verdict."

We have delayed the determination of the case to give consideration to a question involved in it, but which was not argued by counsel. That question is as to the effect of the defendant's discharge upon the hearing of his plea of former jeopardy. Can he, in the event of a reversal of this case upon the state's appeal, be again arrested and held for trial, or was the hearing given him upon his plea of former jeopardy itself a jeopardy, which he may plead in bar when again brought to trial? If the latter should be the case, the question presented to us as to the effect of the discharge of the jury on the first trial would be moot in its nature, and would not be considered by us. State v. Rook, 61 Kan. —, 59 Pac. 653. The subject, as we now view it, in the light of the authorities, is quite free from doubt, although it did not appear so when first occurring to us. Our conclusion is that a hearing upon a plea of former jeopardy alone is not itself a jeopardy, and a discharge upon such hearing is not an acquittal. Pleas of former acquittal or conviction, or former jeopardy, are special pleas of matter not properly involved under the general issue or plea of not guilty. Such being the case, they should be heard and determined apart from the main issue. Wharton, Crim. Pl. §§ 419, 420, 429; Bishop, New Crim. Proc. §§ 799-805. Therefore, a plea of former acquittal, not being of matter involved in the general issue, and not being of matter which goes to the question of guilt or innocence, a judgment sustaining it cannot be in the nature of an acquittal. If such were the case, a judgment against a defendant overruling his plea of former acquittal would be a former conviction, and could be pleaded as autrefois convict to the indictment when again called for trial. Hence the defendant could always escape punishment by pleading a former acquittal to the indictment against him, because, if the plea should be found against him, it would be a former conviction; if in his favor, a former acquittal. For the same reasons a plea of former jeopardy, whether determined one way or the other, cannot be regarded as involving the merits of the case. It does not reach to the question of guilt or innocence, and, if determined in defendant's favor, the state may have an appeal upon the question, if reserved by it. There seems to be some contrariety in the decisions as to whether the defenses of former acquittal, conviction, or jeopardy may be heard under the general issue (9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. title Former Conviction or Acquittal); but we think there are no decisions holding that such defenses, when made under the general issue, are not triable separately from the main question, or, at least, no decisions holding that a hearing upon the special defense is itself a former jeopardy, and a judgment upon it alone a former conviction or acquittal.

The question now recurs, Was the plea of former jeopardy sustained by the record? It is undeniable that the arbitrary and unnecessary discharge of a jury before which an accused person is tried, without a verdict, operates also to discharge the defendant. In such case he has been once in jeopardy. That jeopardy, terminating without fault upon his part and from no overweening necessity, cannot be renewed, and the accused again called upon to defend himself. Code Civ. Proc. § 291 (Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 95), provides: "The jury may be discharged by the court on account of the sickness of a juror, or other accident or calamity requiring their discharge, or by consent of both parties, or after they have been kept together until it satisfactorily appears that there is no probability of their agreeing." The provisions of this section are made applicable to trials of criminal cases. Code Crim. Proc. § 201 (Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 102). Authority for the discharge of a jury trying a criminal case therefore exists if "they have been kept together until it satisfactorily appears that there is no probability of their agreeing." The tribunal primarily intrusted with the duty of determining whether a jury has been kept together until there is no probability of their agreeing is the trial court. The questions whether they have been so kept together, and whether there is a probability of their agreeing, are judicial questions. As such, they cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously determined by the court. The court must be satisfied that the jury, in all probability, cannot agree to a verdict before it should order their discharge. However, when it does become of that conviction, and enters it of record, the correctness of its view and the soundness of its conclusions are not subject to review, unless the record of its action discloses it to be in error. Unless the record discloses hastily formed conclusions, immature judgment, or capricious conduct, the action of the trial judge cannot be reviewed by this or any other court. In State v. Allen, 59 Kan. 758, 54 Pac. 1060, the record of the former trial recited that "the jury not having agreed upon a verdict in the above-entitled cause, the jury is discharged from further consideration of this case." It was therefore held that the existence of no proper or necessary grounds for the discharge of the jury had been shown, but that something more should have appeared than that the jury had not agreed upon a verdict. It should have been shown that there was no probability of their agreeing. The present case, however, is unlike that of State v. Allen, 59 Kan. 758, 54 Pa. 1060. In this case it appeared, not merely that the jury had failed to agree, but that upon inquiry of the foreman, in the presence of his fellows, he had stated that there was no probability of their being able to agree. This statement of the foreman, the usual spokesman of the panel, in the presence of the remainder of the jurors, and not dissented from by them, must be regarded as their conclusion, as well as his. In addition to the inquiry addressed by the court and answered by the foreman, it appears from another recital of the record that the jury had "been absent some time, in consideration of their verdict," before they were again brought into the presence of the court. How long they had been absent does not appear, but we must indulge the presumption that it had been for such a length of time as to enable the court to regard it as some evidence of inability to reach a conclusion. The record further shows, in connection with its recitals of absence of the jury for "some time in consideration of their verdict," and inquiry and answer as to the probability of an agreement, that the jurors were thereupon discharged "because they were unable to agree upon a verdict." It would appear, therefore, that the court acted according to judicial methods in discharging the jury. He took into consideration the length of time, whatever that may have been, the jury had been in consideration of their verdict, and the statement of the foreman, in the presence of the remainder of the jury, and presumably assented to by them, because not dissented from, that they were unable to agree upon a verdict. From these facts he evidently deduced the conclusion that there was no reasonable probability of their being able to agree. While the record of the proceedings was not made as full as such records ought to be made, yet it is sufficiently full to prevent us from saying that the court below erred. While in State v. Allen, 59 Kan. 758, 54 Pac. 1060, it was held that the court had erroneously discharged the jury under the particular circumstances of that case as disclosed by the record, yet the rule was distinctly announced that "the length of time a jury should be kept together, and the improbability of an agreement, must be determined by the trial court from the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and its decision will be conclusive, unless it has abused its discretion in that regard." This statement of the rule is in harmony with the holdings of nearly all the cases. Mr. Bishop says: "The result whereof [of the authorities] would seem to be that when he [the judge] concurs in and affirms the jury's conclusion of inability to agree, and discharges them, the fact so found, the existence whereof nullifies the seeming jeopardy, is absolute and irreversible." 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 1041. An instructive and valuable case, reviewing many of the decisions upon the subject, and showing the rule to be as above stated by Mr. Bishop, and also as herein stated, is State v. Reinhart, 26 Or. 460, 38 Pac. 822.

We think the plea of former jeopardy was improperly sustained. The judgment of the court below sustaining it is therefore reversed, with directions to proceed with the trial of the case.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for the Northern Department, Eastern Division, reversing a judgment of the District Court for Johnson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Smith, J.:

Catherine Blauw and her husband, Ferdinand, executed, in due form, a deed to the real estate in controversy in the following terms:

Whereas, Captain Joseph Parks, deceased, a Shawnee Indian, as a reservee under the treaty of May 10, 1854, concluded between the United States government and the Shawnee tribe of Indians in Kansas, received in his lifetime a patent from the government of the United States to the land hereinafter described (together with other lands), and said land (with other lands) at the death of said Parks descended to said Catherine Swartzell, and her sister Rebecca Vogel, granddaughter of said Parks, and to one Sally Rogers, a daughter of said Parks; and whereas, said Catherine Swartzell succeeds to all the estate in and to said lands hereinafter described by regular conveyance from the other heirs; and whereas, said Catherine has now living with her three sons by her former husband, John T. Swartzell, deceased, namely, Charles T. Swartzell, John A. Swartzell, and Elmer O. Swartzell, all minors of tender years; and whereas, said Catherine has recently intermarried with one Ferdinand C. Blauw; and whereas, said Catherine Blauw being desirous of making provision for her said named children after her death, her said husband consenting thereto by joining with her in this conveyance: Now, therefore, know all men by these presents, that Catherine Blauw (formerly Swartzell) and Ferdinand C. Blauw, her husband, in consideration of the sum of five dollars to them paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and for the love and affection the said Catherine bears to her said-named children, doth hereby grant, bargain, sell, and convey unto the said Charles T. Swartzell, John A. Swartzell, and Elmer O. Swartzell, and to their heirs and assigns, the following described real estate, situate in Johnson county and state of Kansas, to wit: [Then follows a description of the land.] The estate in said lands and tenements not to vest in said named grantees and their heirs until the death of said Catherine Blauw, she reserving in herself a life estate therein. To have and to hold unto the said named grantees and their heirs from and after the death of the said Catherine Blauw, and their heirs and assigns, forever. In witness whereof the said named Catherine Blauw and Ferdinand C. Blauw have hereunto subscribed their hands and seals this 4th day of February, A. D. 1882.

Catherine Blauw. [Seal.]

Ferdinand C. Blauw. [Seal.]

In September 1884, Catherine Blauw filed a petition in the district court against said minors, Charles T., John A., and Elmer O. Swartzell, as defendants. The petition recites the said conveyance of the land by herself and husband to the minor children, and the record of the same, and avers that each of said minors are the owners of an undivided one-third interest in the land so conveyed, subject to a life estate in the plaintiff. It prays that the court determine the value of her life estate, that partition be made of said lands, and so much thereof as should be found to be the value of the life estate of plaintiff be set apart to her. On the final hearing of the cause, the court found that said minors were vested with a fee-simple title to the land; and that Catherine Blauw was vested with a life estate therein; that she was at the time forty-three years old; and that she desired to have the value of the life estate determined, and elects to have the same set out to her. Appraisers were then appointed by the court to value and divide the property upon actual view, and report to the court. They reported as follows: "And now at this day comes J. G. Martin, Philip Reinhart, and George Thomas, commissioners appointed by the court to make partition of the lands described in the order of the court, and hereinafter described, and to divide the land between the parties in the proportion of seven thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight and $\frac{1}{100}$ (\$7,788 $\frac{1}{100}$) dollars, the value of the plaintiff's life estate therein, and five thousand nine hundred and twelve and $\frac{1}{100}$ (\$5,912 $\frac{1}{100}$) dollars, the interest of said defendants in said lands, and to set out to them their respective shares out of the lands as heretofore appraised, at the appraised value thereof, and herewith submit their report, as follows: We set out to Catherine Blauw the following tracts, namely: The S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section three (3), ten acres, appraised at sixteen hundred and twenty dollars (\$1,620); the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section three (3), 20 acres, appraised at thirty-four hundred dollars (\$3,400.00); the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section two, 19 $\frac{8}{100}$ acres, appraised at thirteen hundred and thirty-six $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars (\$1,336.25); and the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ section two (2), 19 $\frac{8}{100}$ acres, appraised at fourteen hundred thirty-one $\frac{1}{100}$ (\$1,431.40).—\$7,787.65. And we set apart to Charles T. Swartzell, John A. Swartzell, and Elmer O. Swartzell, to be held by them in common, as ordered by the court, the following lands, to wit: The N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section three (3), 20 acres, appraised at the sum of nineteen hundred dollars (\$1,900.00); and 48 L. R. A.

the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section three (3), 20 acres, appraised at the sum of twenty-two hundred dollars (\$2,200.00); and the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section two (2), appraised at eighteen hundred and thirteen dollars (\$1,813).—\$5,913.00." The court made the following finding: "And the court finds that the said defendants, Charles T. Swartzell, John A. Swartzell, and Elmer O. Swartzell, are each entitled and vested to an equal undivided one-third part of said lands held in common, subject to a life estate in said lands vested in the plaintiff, Catherine Blauw; and the court finds that the said Catherine Blauw will be forty-four years old at her next succeeding birthday, August —, 1885; and the court finds that the expectation of the life of the said plaintiff, as recognized by the Northampton or annuity table, is twenty-five years and .27 of a year, and that the present value of her life estate in said lands is six per cent upon the aggregate value of the entire estate, multiplied by 10,325, according to said tables, making the present value of her estate, according to the appraised value of the same, nine thousand four hundred and eight and .41 dollars (\$9,408.41)." The decree then orders about 10 acres of the land sold to pay accumulated taxes, and proceeds to set off about two thirds of the land to Catherine Blauw, adjudging her to be the owner of the same in fee simple. Catherine Blauw died about one year afterwards, and her husband, the defendant in error, procured an order from the probate court allotting him one half of said land, and he claims the same on the theory that his wife was seised with a fee-simple title to the land set off to her by the decree in the partition suit. Charles T., John A., and Elmer O. Swartzell conveyed the lands in controversy to the plaintiff in error, Anna M. Love, in September, 1894, and January, 1895.

Mr. J. P. Hindman, for plaintiff in error:

The probate court has no jurisdiction to try the title to land or to make partition of real estate. That power can be exercised only by the district court.

Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 109, §§ 16, 26.

The fact that the Swartzell children occupied only the portion of the land allotted them does not affect their rights or the right of their grantee to recover in this action. Blauw could obtain no additional right to the land by depriving the rightful owners of its use.

There is a tendency, however, in the modern decisions, to uphold conveyances when not clearly repugnant to some well-defined rule of law. Abbott v. Holway, 72 Me. 298; Dismukes v. Parrott, 56 Ga. 513. We are inclined to hold that the better interpretation of the instrument under consideration is to construe it as presently passing an estate in remainder to the grantees, reserving a life estate to the grantor, Mrs. Blauw. Graves v. Atwood, 52 Conn. 612, 52 Am. Rep. 610. By the terms of the deed, a present interest was conveyed to the children of Mrs. Blauw, but their enjoyment of the estate was postponed until after her death. The intention of the parties, also, is to be considered. Mrs. Blauw regarded it as a conveyance, which fact was attested by the partition suit brought by her, in which she treated the instrument as a deed, and the grantees coincided also in her construction of it. If the instrument is not given effect as a deed, it fails of any purpose; for it is not so witnessed as to be valid as a will.

The second question relates to the validity of the partition proceedings brought by Catherine Blauw against her children for a division of the estate. If such proceedings were authorized by law, or were merely voidable, they must be sustained, so far as their effect is involved in this case. We are well convinced, however, that the proceedings were void, in that the court, under the pleadings in the cause, could not take jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the partition suit. In her petition for a division of the property, she avers that she is the owner of a life estate in the lands; that she and her husband executed a deed to her children for the same, reserving to herself a life estate; that the interest of each of said minors defendant is the equal undivided one-third thereof, subject to her life estate therein. The prayer of her petition was "that so much of said land as will be found by appraisement to be of the value of the life estate of plaintiff be set apart to plaintiff in kind, unless it should be found to be injurious to the interest of the parties, in which event that so much land as will yield the value of her life estate be sold, and the proceeds paid to her in money; that the remaining portion of said land be equally divided between said defendants." The defendants in that action answered by general denial filed by their guardian ad litem. To confer jurisdiction upon a court for the partition of an estate, it is indispensable that cotenancy exist between the parties. In a case where the same building covered ground owned by both parties to the action, the supreme court of Illinois, through Mr. Justice Breese, uses this language: "We are satisfied neither a court of law nor equity has jurisdiction over the case as presented by these pleadings, and accord with appellee in the proposition that no power exists to compel the fusion of these estates, to be followed by a sale, and, finally, by a distribution of the proceeds. The idea of the plaintiff in error that he and the defendant in error hold this property jointly is not supported by the title deeds. They are neither joint tenants, tenants in common, nor coparceners, but they severally, each for himself, own distinct parts and portions of the premises, the character of which a court of chancery has no power to change." McConnel v. Kibbe, 43 Ill. 18, 92 Am. Dec. 93. See also Johnson v. Moser, 72 Iowa, 523, 34 N. W. 314. In the case of Smith v. Runnels, 97 Iowa, 55, 65 N. W. 1002, the plaintiff was the owner of a life estate in real property acquired under a will. She brought an action of partition, alleging that the defendants (some thirty-two in number) were collateral heirs to the property, entitled to what remained in the real estate after plaintiff's life estate had terminated. The court said: "Plaintiff having but a life estate in the land, the next question presented is, What authority has a court of equity to order its sale? It is evident that these parties are not joint owners or tenants in common of the same real estate, and it is equally clear that, under our statute, partition can be had only when the land is so owned. As said in the case of Johnson v. Moser, 72 Iowa, 523, 34 N. W. 314:

"There is no necessity to have, nor, in the nature of things, can there be, partition of real estate owned in severalty." See also Clark v. Richardson, 32 Iowa, 399, and Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, § 431. Under the will, plaintiff has the sole use and benefit of the land during her natural life. The defendants have no right to its possession or use until the death of the plaintiff. Whether the plaintiff may make a voluntary disposition of her life estate is a question we need not determine; for, if she has this right, she needs no decree of a court of chancery to assist her in the exercise of the power." See also Seibel v. Rapp, 85 Va. 28, 6 S. E. 478. In Stansbury v. Inglehart, 9 Mackey, 134, it was held that a court of equity not only could not assume jurisdiction to decree partition of land between one having a life estate and the remainderman, but that the consent of the remainderman, where he is an infant, or his ratification, could not give validity to such a decree. It will be noticed that the district court, in Blauw against Swartzell, divested the minors of a large portion of an estate which they owned in fee simple, subject only to the life estate of their mother, and gave it to the latter absolutely, in fee and without condition. The court made a finding that the infants were owners in fee simple, and that Catherine Blauw had simply a life estate, and just how the court proceeded to convert this life estate into a greater one we do not understand. We cannot treat the judgment in that case as voidable merely, and not subject to collateral attack. We regard it as absolutely void. Having a life interest only, and claiming no greater estate in her petition, we think the court was powerless to adjudicate that she take the fee. She had no such community of interest with her children as to authorize partition.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals will be reversed, and the judgment of the District Court affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

City of CHICAGO, Appt.,

v.

Charles NETCHER.

(183 Ill. 104.)

1. An ordinance prohibiting the sale of "any meats, fish, butter, cheese, lard, vegetables, or any other provisions" where dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs are sold, is not authorized by the general incorporation law, art. 5, cl. 50, § 1, under which the city of Chicago was organized, providing that the city council may "regulate" the sale of meats, poultry, fish, butter, cheese, lard, vegetables, and all other provisions, since the ordinance does not provide a regulation of the sale of provisions, but makes an arbitrary prohibition of such sales where certain other goods are sold.
2. The constitutional guaranties of liberty and the protection of property rights are violated by an arbitrary prohibition of the sale of provisions where dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs are sold, since such a prohibition is not an exercise of the police power.

NOTE.—Legal restrictions on department stores.

Popular sentiment against trusts, monopolies, and all kinds of great business combinations or aggregations has led Congress and some state legislatures to attempt various restrictions. Department stores grown into immense proportions, and driving small traders out of business, have received the attention of several state legislatures.

In Indiana and Wisconsin statutes were passed in 1897 authorizing municipalities to license and regulate such stores, but in neither of these states does there appear to have been any judicial determination as to the constitutionality of such statutes.

In Missouri the act of 1899, which is held void in the case of Starn ex rel. Wyatt v. Ashbrook, post, 265, made an attempt at direct state regulation of such establishments. The statute practically prohibited such stores by the imposition of a heavy license tax on the privilege of selling goods from each one of numerous groups or classes of merchandise, permitting sales to be made without license from only one of such classes or groups.

In commenting upon this legislation in the annual review of the legislation of the country, before the American Bar Association in 1899, the president's address pertinently says: "Did the lawmakers desire precedent for the attempted destruction of department stores, they could have found absolute prohibition of the carrying on of more than one business, under heavy penalties, among the discarded rubbish of the English law in statutes of the golden time when the might of kings controlled the right of subjects. It is unnecessary to state in this presence that long ages ago these impositions upon personal liberty were consigned, with many others of like import, to the dust heap."

In Illinois, without any statutory authority, the Chicago city council attempted to regulate such stores by arbitrarily prohibiting the sale of provisions or intoxicating liquors in any store where dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs are sold. This ordinance was held invalid in Chicago v. Netcher, not only because

3. An ordinance prohibiting the sale of any intoxicating liquors in any place of business where dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and hardware are kept for sale is not authorized by the general incorporation act, art. 5, cl. 46, § 1, giving cities power to "license, regulate, and prohibit" the sale of such liquors, since the ordinance is not an exercise of the police power, but is purely arbitrary, not having any connection with, and not tending in any way towards the protection of, the public against the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquors.

4. In order to sustain legislative interference with the business of the citizen by virtue of the police power it is necessary that the act should have some reasonable relation to the subjects included in such power.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce an ordinance penalty against defend-of the lack of statutory authority, but also because of its violation of constitutional rights.

These cases from Missouri and Illinois, which are fully reported above, agree in holding that regulations of business for the mere purpose of preventing many or several kinds of goods to be sold in the same establishment do not constitute a legitimate exercise of the police power. No other decisions on this question have yet been rendered, but no different decision upon it could be rendered which would not put all private business at the mercy of the legislature and municipal councils by giving them unlimited power to divide and subdivide any lawful business, and to make it unlawful for any person to carry on more than a petty portion thereof. This would be to give such bodies the power practically to prohibit the carrying on of business conceded to be legitimate and useful to the community. Such an extension of the police power as this would constitute a great departure from the principles of constitutional law which have been hitherto regarded as settled.

Anti-trust laws, as affecting other subjects, have been passed upon in some earlier cases in this series of reports. Co.* (Ark.) 45 L. R. A. 348; and State, Crow v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. (Mo.) 45 L. R. A. 863.

Messrs. Wilson, Moore, & McIlvaine also for appellee.

Cartwright, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two prosecutions were instituted before a justice of the peace by the city of Chicago, appellant, against Charles Netcher, appellee, for the violation of two ordinances of said city. In each case he was found guilty, and fined $25 and costs by the justice. On appeal to the criminal court of Cook county the cases were tried upon agreed statements of fact before the court without a jury. In each case the court held the ordinance upon which the prosecution was based to be void, in propositions of law submitted for that purpose, and found the defendant not guilty. The city prosecuted appeals from these judgments to this court. The cases, being of the same nature, and largely involving the same questions of law, have been argued together, and will be considered and disposed of in this opinion.

The defendant is the owner of what is known as a "department store," or general store for the sale of different kinds of merchandise, divided into separate departments, in the city of Chicago. The ordinances are directed against stores of that class, and the object of each is to prohibit the sale of certain kinds of merchandise in any store or place of business where certain other kinds of merchandise are sold. One of these ordinances provides as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation doing business in this city, where dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs are sold, to have exposed for sale, or sell to any person, firm, or corporation, any meats, fish, butter, cheese, lard, vegetables, or any other provisions." The facts agreed upon at the trial for the violation of this ordinance were that the defendant owned, conducted, and operated the store in question, and in the basement and on certain floors exposed for sale and sold dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs, and on a different floor, where no such articles were sold or exposed for sale he exposed for sale and sold meats, fish, butter, cheese, lard, vegetables, and other provisions. The city of Chicago is organized under the general incorporation law, and must find in its charter authority for the exercise of every power which it claims to possess. The authority to pass this ordinance is claimed by virtue of cl. 50, § 1, art. 6, of said act, which enumerates among the powers of the city council the following: "To regulate the sale of meats, poultry, fish, butter, cheese, lard, vegetables, and all other provisions, and to provide for place and manner of selling the same." Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1895, p. 267. Regulations concerning the sale of provisions have relation to the public health, and may be necessary or proper for its preservation and the suppression of disease. Kinsley v. Chicago, 124 Ill. 359, 16 N. E. 260. The clause of the incorporation act relied upon confers upon cities organized under the act the right to regulate the sale of provisions, with the object of promoting or preserving the public health, where the regulation tends to serve that purpose. But this ordinance does not regulate the business of selling provisions, nor prescribe the manner in which the business shall be carried on. It merely prohibits persons engaged in the business of selling dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs from selling in their stores the provisions enumerated in the ordinance. It permits a person to sell in any place or manner, provided, only, that he does not at the same time sell certain other things. A dealer may sell provisions at the same place with hardware, furniture, boots and shoes, hats and caps, millinery, books and stationery, crockery and glassware, carpets, confectionery, wooden ware, wall paper, or any other sort of merchandise except dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs. This is not a regulation, but a prohibition, and a purely arbitrary one, which attempts to deprive certain persons of exercising a right which has always been lawful, and has been heretofore exercised throughout the state and country without question. The ordinance is also an attempted interference by the city with rights guaranteed to the defendant by the Constitutions of the United States and of this state. The questions involved are not new. They have been before this and other courts throughout this country in numerous cases, and the rights of the citizen, as against such interference, have been frequently defined, and uniformly upheld. These Constitutions insure to every person liberty, and the protection of his property rights, and provide that he shall not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The liberty of the citizen includes the right to acquire property, to own and use it, to buy and sell it. It is a necessary incident to the ownership of property that the owner shall have a right to sell or barter it, and this right is protected by the Constitution as such an incident of ownership. When an owner is deprived of the right to expose for sale and sell his property, he is deprived of property, within the meaning of the Constitution, by taking away one of the incidents of ownership. Liberty includes the right to pursue such honest calling or avocation as the citizen may choose, subject only to such restrictions as may be necessary for the protection of the public health, morals, safety, and welfare. The state, for the purpose of public protection, may, in the proper exercise of the police power, impose restrictions and regulations; but the right to acquire and dispose of property is subject only to that power. The individual may pursue, without let or hindrance from anyone, all such callings or pursuits as are innocent in themselves, and not injurious to the public. These are fundamental rights of every person living under this government. The legislature can neither, by an enactment of its own, interfere with such rights, nor authorize a municipal corporation to do so. Fraser v. People use of School Fund, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492, 31 N. E. 395; Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 853, 32 N. E. 364; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, 35 N. E. 62; Cooley, Const. Lim. 393.

In order to sustain legislative interference with the business of the citizen by virtue of the police power, it is necessary that the act should have some reasonable relation to the subjects included in such power. If it is claimed that the statute or ordinance is referable to the police power, the court must be able to see that it tends, in some degree, towards the prevention of offenses, or the preservation of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare. It must be apparent that some such end is the one actually intended, and that there is some connection between the provisions of the law and such purpose. If it is manifest that the statute or ordinance has no such object, but, under the guise of a police regulation, is an invasion of the property rights of the individual, it is the duty of the court to declare it void. Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, 35 N. E. 62; Eden v. People, 161 Ill. 296, 32 L. R. A. 659, 43 N. E. 1108; Cooley, Const. Lim. 577. It 48 L. R. A.

is not claimed in the argument for the city that the selling of the different kinds of merchandise mentioned in the ordinance in the same building tends in any way to affect the safety, health, morals, comfort, or welfare of the public. No attempt is made to suggest any grounds upon which the ordinance can be justified as an exercise of the police power of the city or the state. It certainly cannot be contended that there is anything in the character of dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and drugs which renders it dangerous to the public, or inimical to the general welfare, that they should be sold in the same building with provisions. General stores have always dealt in all kinds of merchandise, and no one has ever imagined that the comfort, safety, or welfare of the public was in any manner or to any extent injured or prejudiced by them. Public health and public comfort are in no way affected by selling the different kinds of merchandise enumerated in different departments of the same building, and would not be if the same clerk should sell them; nor would the public welfare or comfort be increased by compelling a customer to buy one kind of merchandise in one store and another in some other store. In Meyers v. Baker, 120 Ill. 567, 60 Am. Rep. 580, 12 N. E. 79, the act prohibiting the establishment of any tent, booth, or place of vending provisions or refreshments within a certain distance of a camp meeting was sustained as a police regulation tending to prevent disturbance or disorderly conduct. But this ordinance has no such purpose. It is plain that its object is not to protect the health, morals, or safety of the public, or to accomplish any object falling within the police power. It is a mere attempt to deny a property right to a particular class in the community, where all other members of the community are left to enjoy it. It is immaterial whether such a denial is in a statute or in an ordinance passed by virtue of a statute. It is equally invalid in either case.

The other ordinance, under which the second prosecution was begun, provides as follows: "It shall be and is unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to have exposed for sale or sell any intoxicating, malt, or fermented liquors in any place of business in the city of Chicago where any dry goods, clothing, jewelry, or hardware are kept or exposed for sale." The agreed statement of facts is that the defendant kept in his above-mentioned store dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and hardware, and exposed them for sale in the basement and on certain floors, and on a different floor kept and exposed for sale and sold intoxicating, malt, and fermented liquors; that no liquors of any kind were sold to be drunk on the premises, and none were kept except in sealed bottles or jugs, which were delivered to the purchaser at the store, or delivered by wagons; and that defendant had complied with all the rules and ordinances of the city, and was entitled to sell intoxicating, malt, and fermented liquors in said store, except so far as he was disqualified and prevented, if at all, by said ordinance. The authority of the city to regulate the liquor business is found in clause 46 of said § 1 of article 5 of the incorporation act, as follows: "To license, regulate, and prohibit the selling or giving away of any intoxicating, malt, vinous, mixed, or fermented liquor, the license not to extend beyond the municipal year in which it shall be granted, and to determine the amount to be paid for such license." Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1895, p. 267. The liquor business is one peculiarly subject to the police power on account of the multitude of evils which result from it. Police regulation of that business has always been sustained, as having for its object the prevention of intemperance, pauperism, and crime, and diminishing, as far as practicable, the injurious consequences to the public resulting from the business. In Schwuchow v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 444, it was said: "This business is, on principle, within the police power of the state, and restrictions which may rightfully be imposed upon it might be obnoxious as an illegal restraint of trade when applied to other pursuits." It is clearly within the police power to prohibit all sales of liquor on the ground that "drum drinking is an evil to the person, and pernicious to the welfare of the public." Dennehy v. Chicago, 120 Ill. 627, 12 N. E. 227. The city may also form prohibition districts for the protection of particular neighborhoods from the influence of dram shops, wherever it is desirable or reasonable that there should be such prohibition, although the sale may be licensed in other parts of the city. People ex rel. Morrison v. Cregier, 138 Ill. 401, 28 N. E. 812. This ordinance, however, is not an exercise of the police power for the protection of the public from the injurious effects of the liquor business. It is not aimed at the suppression of the business, either in certain localities or upon any ground of police regulation, but is directed solely against the sale by certain persons in their places of business; that is, by those who also sell dry goods, clothing, jewelry, or hardware. The city of Chicago has not seen fit to prohibit the sale of liquor, either generally or in the district of the city where defendant's store is kept. It has established its policy with reference to that business, and defendant has complied with its ordinances, so as to be entitled to sell liquor in his store, unless this ordinance constitutes a valid prohibition against his doing so. It is apparent that, if there is any evil in permitting a sealed bottle of liquor to be sold from a store where dry goods, clothing, jewelry, or hardware are sold, the same evils would result from the sale from any other kind of a store. The ordinance permits the dealer in all kinds of merchandise, except dry goods, clothing, jewelry, and hardware, to sell liquor from his store, and the city cannot arbitrarily discriminate against the defendant without any basis or ground for the discrimination. Special privileges are not to be granted to favored persons in the liquor business any more than in any other business. Zanone v. Mound City, 103 Ill. 552. There are other clerks employed in the other departments of defendant's store, separate and independent from this, but there is no liquor drunk on the premises, and none sold there for that purpose; so that the ordinance could not have been intended to prevent making a drinking place where clerks are employed in other lines of business. The restriction is purely arbitrary, not having any connection with, and not tending in any way towards the protection of, the public against the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquor. That was not the object of the ordinance, and the attempted discrimination is illegal, and in violation of the defendant's rights.

The criminal court was right in holding both ordinances void, and the judgments are affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Missouri ex rel. John C. WYATT, Respt.,
v.

Thomas R. ASHBROOK et al., Appts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. An exercise of the power of taxation for the sole purpose of revenue or undue restraint or prohibition of a business will not be saved from the constitutional restrictions that apply to it as the imposition of a tax, by its designation in the statute as a "license fee."
2. A statute which nowhere attempts to protect any public interest, or defend against any public wrong, which shows

NOTE.—In connection with this case, see the preceding case of CHICAGO V. NETCHER (Ill.) ante, 261, and footnote thereto.

upon its face that regulation is not its purpose, but that revenue or undue restriction of a business in the interest of others is the aim in view, cannot be sustained as an exercise of the police power, although it purports to be "An Act to Regulate Business and Trade."

3. To sustain a statute as an exercise of the police power, the courts must be able to see that its object to some degree tends toward the prevention of some offense or manifest evil, or that it has for its aim the preservation of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare.
4. The sale in one store or building, under one head or unit of management, of different articles enumerated in the different classes or groups designated by the Missouri anti-department store act of May 16, 1899, cannot be deemed harmful and dangerous so as to be subject to regulation by the police power, merely because fifteen or more persons may be employed in the establishment, if it is innocent and harmless to sell articles of any one class or group, and also to sell those of different classes or groups in establishments employing less than fifteen persons.

5. An imposition by the general assembly of taxes upon municipal corporations or the inhabitants or property thereof for municipal purposes, in violation of Const. art. 10, §§ 1, 10, is made by the Missouri anti-department store act of May 16, 1899, § 6, providing that the two thirds of the license fee or tax imposed upon department-store merchants is to be paid to the treasurer of the city wherein such stores are located, and the remaining third to the state treasury for the use of the state.
6. The requirement of uniform taxation upon the same class of subjects, made by Const. art. 10, § 3, is violated by the anti-department store act of May 16, 1899, imposing license taxes upon those merchants in cities having 50,000 or more inhabitants who employ fifteen or more persons in the same establishment, and sell goods enumerated in more than one of the classes or groups designated in the act, while the amount of tax to be imposed in any city, is, within certain limits, left to the discretion of commissioners who may fix different rates for the different cities governed by the statute.
7. The ambiguity or uncertainty in the language of the Missouri anti-department store act of May 16, 1899, which leaves it a matter purely of guess work to determine whether the license fee is intended to be exacted for selling the articles of each of the seventy-three classes or for only each of the twenty-eight groups therein designated, and also fails to define the life and duration of the license to be issued, whether it is for a day, month, or year, for the life of the applicant, or for the duration of his business at a fixed place, is sufficient to render the statute void.
8. Due process of law is denied when any particular person of a class or of a community is singled out for the imposition of restraints or burdens not imposed upon, or to be borne by, all of the class or of the community at large, unless the imposition or restraint be based upon existing distinctions that differentiate the particular individuals of the class to be affected from the body of the community.

APPEAL by defendants from a decision of the Circuit Court, Buchanan County, against the constitutionality of a statute imposing a license tax on the privilege of conducting a department store, and granting a mandamus to compel the issuance of such a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The anti-department store act (Acts 1899, p. 70, § 3) is limited by its terms to cities containing 50,000 inhabitants or more, thus dividing cities of the second class into two classes, and violating § 7 of art. 9 of the state Constitution.

No good reason can be shown for the arbitrary discrimination made between merchants by this act.

Kansas City v. Grush, 151 Mo. 128, 52 S. W. 286.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding by mandamus, commenced by the relator in the Buchanan circuit court, for the purpose of compelling the auditor, treasurer, and comptroller of the city of St. Joseph, the defendants herein, to issue to him a merchant's license to conduct a department store in said city. The defendants had refused to issue the license applied for unless the relator would first pay into the city treasury two thirds, and into the state treasury one third, of the amount required to be so paid by § 6 of what is known as the "Anti-Department Store Act," approved May 16, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 72), in addition to the tax imposed by the general laws of the city for a merchant's license. In the alternative writ, which follows in detail the allegations of the petition therefor, the laws and ordinances of the city of St. Joseph prescribing the various requirements necessary to be followed in order to secure a merchant's license are set forth. The writ then shows that the relator complied with all those requirements in his application for a license; and it was refused by the defendants on the sole ground, as shown in the writ, that he had not paid into the state and city treasury the license fees required by the act referred to, in addition to the ad valorem tax required of all merchants under the general laws of the city, and which the relator has tendered in connection with his application. The writ further shows that in his application for the license the relator clearly indicated that he desired the license to conduct a department store within the city for the sale of five different classes or departments of goods as defined by said act. It shows that he intended to sell the goods at retail and through twenty clerks or employees engaged by him for that purpose; that the relator filed his application for the license desired by him with the defendant Ashbrook, as city auditor, on September 15, 1899,—one hundred and twenty-two days after the passage and approval of the act in question,—ignoring its provisions, tendering the license fee under the general levy made by the city for taxes, and demanding of the defendants, and each of them, that they perform the acts required by the general laws and ordinances of the city where a merchant's license is applied for, and which are set forth in the alternative writ of mandamus. The alternative writ also shows that the license was refused by defendants solely on the ground that relator had not complied with the provisions of said act. For a return to the alternative writ, the defendants filed a demurrer, alleging as grounds therefor that the matters and things set forth in the alternative writ are not sufficient in law or equity to entitle the plaintiff to the relief asked for, or to authorize the issuing of a writ of mandamus. The court below overruled said demurrer, and in its decree specially held the act under consideration to be unconstitutional and void. The defendants declined to plead further, and the court thereupon rendered final decree for the plaintiff, and directed the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandamus, commanding the defendants, and each of them, to do and perform the acts and things required conditionally by the alternative writ, and which were necessary to be performed in the issuance of the license applied for by the relator. From this final decree, the defendants have appealed to this court.

The only question involved in this controversy is as to whether this act, known as the "Anti-Department Store Law," a brief synopsis of which is given below, is operative or constitutional. By § 1 of the act, all goods, wares, and merchandise in the cities to which it now applies are divided into seventy-three classes, and these classes are then rearranged into twenty-eight groups or departments. By § 2 of the act, from and after one hundred and twenty days after its passage it is made unlawful for any person or persons, firm, corporation, or association of persons to have on hand for sale, sell, or expose for sale, at retail, any goods, wares, and merchandise of more than one of these several classes or groups, without first having obtained a license therefor, as provided for in the act. By § 3 it is provided that during the 120 days from the passage of the act the board of officers of the city charged with the duty of issuing merchant's licenses, and after that a license commissioner for each city, to be appointed by the governor, are authorized to issue merchants' licenses. By a proviso in this section the act is limited in its application to such cities of the state as have or may hereafter have 50,000 inhabitants or more. By § 4 the applicant for license is required to state the class or group under which he proposes to conduct his business, and also state what additional class or group, or what additional article or articles in any class or group, he desires to keep or sell, and also the street number at which he proposes to conduct his business. By § 5 the board or license commissioner charged with the duty of issuing licenses is empowered to fix the sum to be paid for licenses required by the act, but which sum is not to be fixed at less than $300 nor more than $500 for every class or group, or for any particular article of any class or group named in the application, in addition to the principal business to be conducted by the applicant. The license fee thus fixed is to be uniform in each city. Section 6 prohibits the issuance of any license, until the applicant shall have paid into the city treasury two thirds and into the state treasury one third of the amount required to secure the license. Section 7 provides a punishment by imprisonment in the county jail for a term not exceeding one year, and the payment of a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, for the violation of any provision of the act, and makes each day's violation a new offense. Section 8 provides that the act "shall not apply to manufacturing establishments, warehouse or auction houses, or to any establishment where not more than fifteen persons are employed."

No question is made here by respondent as to the right of relator to compel by mandamus the issuance to him of the license applied for if the act known as the "Anti-Department Store Bill" is unconstitutional or inoperative, as declared by the circuit court in its disposition of the case. The duty of respondent being clearly ministerial where all the requirements of the law preliminary to acquiring a license have been complied with by relator its issuance, if refused, was properly compellable by mandamus. And it might further be added that no question ought to be raised as to the character of the imposition levied by the act, notwithstanding it is called a "license fee," and the act imposing it is designated "An Act to Regulate Business and Trade in Cities Having a Population of 50,000 Inhabitants or Over," etc. Courts look beyond the mere title of an act to see and determine its real object, purpose, and result; and where the power of taxation therein provided for is exercised for the mere purpose of revenue, or undue restraint or prohibition,—as is most manifest in the act in question,—its designation as "license fee" will not save it from the constitutional restrictions that would apply to it as the imposition of a tax. In no sense can this most extraordinary act be regarded as a police measure, and, consequently, does not fall within the protection of the police power. It nowhere attempts to protect any public interest, or defend against any public wrong. It shows upon its face that regulation is not its purpose, but that revenue, or undue restriction in the interest of others, not embraced in the class designated, is the aim in view. While a most onerous license fee by name is imposed, no police inspection, supervision, or regulation is provided, nor is any standard set for the applicant to establish, or that he agrees to attain or maintain, but any and all persons engaged in the business designated in the act, without qualification or hindrance, may come, and a license, on payment of the stipulated sum to the commissioner named in the act, will issue, to do business, subject to no prescribed rule of conduct, and under no guardian eye, but according to the unrestrained judgment or fancy of the applicant and licensee. The applicant is simply required to pay his money and take out his license. That is the beginning and the ending of the police supervision and control over him or his business, so far as concerns the act in question. In order to sustain legislation of the character of the act in question as a police measure, the courts must be able to see that its object to some degree tends towards the prevention of some offense or manifest evil, or has for its aim the preservation of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare. If no such object is discernible, but the mere guise and masquerade of public control, under the name of "An Act to Regulate Business and Trade," etc., is adopted, that the liberty and property rights of the citizens may be invaded, the court will strike down the act as unwarranted. Mere legislative assumption of the right to direct and indicate the channel and course into which the private energies of the citizen shall flow, or the attempt to abridge or hamper his right to pursue any lawful calling or avocation which he may choose without unreasonable regulation or molestation, have ever been condemned in all free government.

No suggestion is made by counsel in their effort to sustain this act, and, to our mind, none can be conjectured, why the selling of any or all of the articles of merchandise embraced in two or more of the classes or groups designated therein in one store or building, under one head or unit of management, when fifteen or more persons are employed, is a thing of danger to the public, or that the morals, health, safety, or comfort of the community will to any extent be injured or prejudiced thereby in any manner different or greater than would result if the same articles were sold in different store buildings, run by the same person, corporation, or company as independent establishments, and each employing fifteen or more persons, or when all of the enumerated articles are sold in one store wherein less than fifteen persons are employed. If the selling of the different articles enumerated in any one of the classes or groups designated by the act is innocent and harmless when pursued separately as a business, how does it become harmful and dangerous merely because the articles in two or more classes or groups designated in the act became united for sale under one unit of management, and the business conducted in one building, where fifteen or more persons are employed, so that it would call for special legislation with increased and onerous license fees or tax burdens imposed. Such grouping together for sale or disposition of those articles of daily use and necessity does not endanger or threaten the peace and good order of society. They neither engender disease, spread contagion, corrupt the morals, nor encourage dissipation or vice in any form because of such combination, and no sanction for such reasons can be found for the act as a public measure.

As said above, the act, though entitled "An Act to Regulate Business and Trade in Cities Having a Population of Fifty Thousand Inhabitants and Over," is clearly an exercise of the power of taxation, and must be enforced, if at all, under and according to the constitutional limitations and restrictions on the subject of taxation. Conceding that the legislature is not limited to any form of taxation, and that it may impose a license tax as well as a direct tax upon the department-store merchant, and further treat the imposition provided in the act in question as a tax imposed direct by the legislature, and not a delegation of power to the commissioner therein named to fix an uncertain and varying sum between $300 and $500, as his fancy may suggest (which the relator in this case most strenuously contends is done), then the tax to be paid under the act in question is violative of the provision of § 10 of article 10 of our Constitution, which declares that "the general assembly shall not impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns, or other municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes, but may by general laws vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes." By § 1 of the same article it is further provided that "the taxing power may be exercised by the general assembly for state purposes, and by counties and other municipal corporations, under authority granted to them by the general assembly, for county and other corporate purposes." Section 6 of the act in question provides that "no such license shall be issued until the person, firm, corporation, or association of persons applying therefor shall pay to the city treasurer of the city two thirds, and into the state treasury one third, of the amount fixed by the board or officer receiving such application, as due and payable therefor." While the legislature might authorize the municipality to be affected by the act in question—as it has done in the city charters and in the general laws regulating the incorporations of cities—to license and tax certain occupations and callings, and to impose taxes on all the property within its limits for municipal purposes, it cannot itself, or through the agency of the commissioners, to be appointed under the act, any more impose such tax directly upon such occupation or business in cities for city purposes than it can directly impose taxes upon city property for city purposes. As will be seen by § 6 of the act in question, two thirds of the license fee or tax imposed thereunder upon the department-store merchant is to be paid to the treasurer of the city wherein such store is located, and goes into the city treasury for city purposes, while the remaining one third of the tax named is to be paid into the state treasury, for the use of the state; whereas § 10 of article 10 of the Constitution above quoted expressly inhibits the general assembly from imposing taxes upon cities or other municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for city or other municipal purposes, and directs that by general laws it may vest in the corporate authorities thereof power to so assess and collect all taxes for corporate purposes. Section 1 of said article 10 of the Constitution is likewise mandatory in directing how the taxing power may be exercised by the general assembly and by the cities and municipal corporations of our state, and excludes the assertion of authority attempted by the act in question. And again it might be suggested that, as part of the imposition provided for in § 6 of the act in question is a city tax, the state not only was wanting in authority to impose it upon the city, or the inhabitants or property thereof, but to appropriate any part to itself, and, if the imposition be treated as a state tax, the legislature had no right to give or remit any part of the state's revenue to the city.

But aside from the question as to whether the tax to be imposed be considered as a municipal or state tax that should have been imposed by the legislature of the state or by the cities of the state, relator insists that the act is vitally defective in that it delegates to the commissioner named in the act, to be appointed by the governor, the power to fix the amount of the license fee or tax, and for that reason violates § 1 of article 10 of the Constitution. By § 5 of this act it provided that "the said board or officer in such city charged with the duty of issuing merchant's licenses, shall have power to fix the sum to be paid for licenses required by this act, but such license fee shall not be fixed at less than three nor more than five hundred dollars for every class or group, or for any particular article of any class or group mentioned in the application for such license," etc. While a minimum below which and a maximum above which the commissioner cannot go has been designated in the act, the authority to name and fix the amount of the imposition between those designated sums is plainly delegated to the commissioner, and can be exercised according to his arbitrary discretion in the premises, subject only to the qualification, as further set out in the section, "that the license fee exacted shall be uniform in each city in which it is collected." Until the commissioner acts and determines upon the rate of the imposition to be levied within the limits of the city for which he is appointed, no one of that community can determine from the law itself what the license fee or tax is or will be. Until he acts, the rate of the tax is an unknown quantity. In fact, until he acts, there is no tax provided. An undetermined tax is in law no tax. The determination of the amount or rate of a tax to be imposed is as essential an exercise of the taxing power as the designation of the property to be taxed, or the time for its collection or enforcement.

And here, again, on account of the delegated authority to the commissioner, to be named under the act, to fix the sum to be paid for the license therein required, the further objection is urged to it that it is violative of the uniformity clause of our state Constitution, which, by § 3 of article 10 of the Constitution, provides that all taxes to be levied and collected for public purposes "shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general law." Ignoring, for the present, the question that the merchants doing business in the cities of our state having a population of 50,000 inhabitants or more, in one store or building, where fifteen or more persons are employed, have been arbitrarily singled out by this act as a class to themselves, that additional burdens might be imposed upon them, from which all other merchants of the state are exempted, all of the class of merchants thus arbitrarily named under this act are not subject to the same uniform rate of tax. Even as to them the tax may vary, according to the whim and fancy of the different commissioners to be named by the governor for the different cities, as will be seen from a reading of the act. The merchant in St. Joseph, for selling the articles enumerated in each of the classes or groups designated in the act (more than one), may be required to pay $300, while for selling the same articles in Kansas City his brother department-store merchant may be required to pay $400, and the merchant of St. Louis be required to pay $500, and all under the same act, and where a part of the tax to be collected from each goes to the same common public purpose. So the practical operation of the act in question not only makes an arbitrary class of merchants in cities of 50,000 inhabitants or more, doing a retail business under one unit of management, where fifteen or more persons are employed, as contradicting from all other merchants of such cities, and all other merchants of the state outside of cities of 50,000 inhabitants or more, whether conducting business under the same condition as those designated in the class defined by the act or otherwise, but all merchants of that class are not necessarily subject to the same uniform rates of taxation, since the rate between three or five hundred dollars is to be fixed and determined according to the discretion of the different commissioners to be appointed for the various cities coming within the influence of the act. But the inequality and want of uniformity in the matter of the application of the act to the merchants of the designated class is made more striking when it is suggested that under it the commissioner (say for the city of St. Joseph) may determine that he will require license fee for selling the articles classified and enumerated under each one of the twenty-eight groups of articles designated in the act to be kept and sold by the merchant of that city (less the articles named in any one group, which he may sell without the requirement of a license), when then the highest license fee that would be required in that city for selling all articles of merchandise enumerated in the act would be 300 times 27, or $8,100, while in St. Louis, perhaps, the commissioner appointed to look after the interests of that city, being a man of more comprehensive views, and of a disposition to give to the act a more liberal and far-reaching interpretation, to meet the present pressing needs of that city, and being a man of bold financial reach, might determine that a license fee for each of the seventy-three classes of articles enumerated in the act was required, and would further fix $500 as the amount of the license fee to be imposed for the selling of articles of each class over and above the articles of one class that can be sold without a license, then we would have the merchant of that city, for conducting the same business as the St. Joseph merchant paying for his license seventy-two times $500, or the enormous sum of $36,000; thus making the possible astounding difference of $27,900 between the amounts to be paid by merchants, arbitrarily created by this act, for the mere purpose that they might be legislated against.

Thus it is seen that the uniformity clause of the Constitution has been violated in this act, not only by the arbitrary and unreasonable classification of merchants of a natural class, for the particular purpose of this particular imposition, and also on account of the discretion given to the commissioner to be named under the act to fix, in different cities, different license fees or rates of taxation upon the merchants of the same designated class, but the very uncertainty in the language of the act has introduced another element of possible and probable inequality and want of uniformity in the matter of determining the amount of the tax to be fixed and imposed. In the exercise of the taxing power, which is the very essence of sovereignty, and of the gravest consequences to the citizen, there ought to be no ambiguity or uncertainty in the language of the law. An act which attempts to levy such burdensome taxation as that provided in the act in question should at least be plain, and past all misunderstanding, as to the basis on which the computation is to be made: and yet from a reading of the act no one can tell whether for the selling or exposing for sale by a merchant of the designated class all the different articles of goods, wares, and merchandise enumerated therein a license fee or tax is to be exacted for selling or exposing to sale the articles named in each of the seventy-three classes or only the twenty-eight groups of articles. The act provides that a license fee shall be fixed at not less than $300 nor more than $500 "for every class or group or for any particular article of any class or group mentioned in the application for such license." The words "class" and "group" are used together throughout the act as "class or group," and nothing is to be found therein to indicate which is to be considered or what is to be rejected or ignored in the matter of computing the amount of license fee to be collected, by the commissioner called upon to execute the act. As to whether a license fee is intended to be exacted for selling the articles of each of the seventy-three classes or for only each of the twenty-eight groups of articles, it is a matter of pure guess-work, a thing of blind conjecture, a foundation too uncertain and untenable upon which to rest the cumbrous tax imposition provided in the act. But the uncertainty as to the meaning of the act is not only made to appear from the use of irreconcilable words and language found therein, but also on account of the absence of proper words therein defining the life and duration of the license to be issued by the terms of the act. Whether the license provided for in the act is to issue and run for a day, month, or a year, or for life of the applicant, or for the duration of his business at a fixed place, nothing is to be found in the act to inform one; and again we are driven to the field of conjecture and speculation, without data upon which to predicate a construction as to what is meant. We know of no rule of construction that would justify this court giving to this act a definite meaning not somewhere disclosed or indicated within its four corners. The act is clearly void for uncertainty.

But, independent of all these objections to the form and structure of the act, to the mode, manner, and amount of the attempted imposition, or as to whether the imposition be treated as a tax or a license, the act is further assailed upon the broad constitutional ground that, as unwarranted class legislation, it is violative of the natural rights of the citizen defined in § 4 of article 2 of our Constitution (Bill of Rights), which declares "that all persons have a natural right to life, liberty, and the enjoyment of the gains of their own industry," and of § 30 of the same article, which declares "that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The protection of liberty and of property, defined in § 4 of the Constitution, supra, "as the gains of their own industry," are among the principal objects for which free government among men has been established, and, as further declared in the closing paragraph of said section, "that when government does not confer this security it fails of its chief design," and of these rights no person shall be deprived without "due process of law," which means, as declared by this, as of all courts of the land, to be "the law of the land;" and these words, when having reference to legislative enactments, must mean a requirement of action or abstinence, binding upon and affecting alike each and every member of the community of the same class, or of similar circumstances, enacted for the general public good or welfare. Does the act in question, by the imposition of the license fee provided for therein, infringe upon the liberty of the citizen whom it is to affect, or his right to the enjoyment of the gains of his industry, or its equivalent, his property? If the terms "life," "liberty," and "property" as used in the Constitution, are "representative terms, and cover every right to which a member of the body politic is entitled under the law," as said by Sherwood, J., in State v. Julow, 129 Mo. 172, 29 L. R. A. 258, 31 S. W. 782, and that within this comprehensive scope are embraced the right to buy and sell as others may, and to pursue such honest calling, vocation, or business as the citizen may choose, subject only to such restraints or the imposition of such burdens as may be required or imposed for the general good, and if "due process of law" is to be defined as "the law of the land," designed to protect and preserve the rights of the citizen against arbitrary legislation, as well as against arbitrary executive or judicial action, then "due process of law" is denied when any particular person of a class or of the community is singled out for the imposition of restraints or burdens not imposed upon and to be borne by all of the class, or of the community at large, unless the imposition or restraint be based upon existing distinctions that differentiate the particular individuals of the class to be affected from the body of the community; and this question as to whether the persons thus designated constitute a natural or a reasonable class depends upon facts which the court passing upon the validity or invalidity of the legislation must determine upon. While the legislature, under its vested authority and power, may arbitrarily impose taxes, restraints, and burdens of various kinds, within the constitutional limitations prescribed, that may become most onerous and oppressive to the citizen, which the courts can do naught but uphold, it cannot create conditions or flat classes that will operate to make legislation alone applicable to those artificial conditions and classes as general law within the meaning of the Constitution, or that will entitle it to the designation of "the law of the land," or that will make the act "due process of law" by which alone the liberty of the citizen may be restrained, or his property burdened or disposed of. As said above, no reason has been given or suggested, and, to our minds, none can be conceived, why the arbitrary selection of persons and corporations having or exposing for sale, in the same store or building, under a unit of management or superintendency, at retail, in the cities of the state having a population of 50,000 inhabitants, any articles of goods, wares, or merchandise set out and named in

§ 1 of the act in question of more than one of the several classifications or groups therein designated, when fifteen or more persons are employed, was named or made, for the imposition of the license fee provided in the act, from which all other persons and merchants of the state are exempted. Such classification is wholly without reason or necessity. It is so arbitrary and unreasonable as to defy suggestion to the contrary. The simple statement of its creation is a most fatal blow to its continued existence. It is truly "classification run wild." It is special legislation unrestrained. To have made the act apply to all merchants of a given avoirdupois, or to those employing clerks of a designated statute, or to those doing business in buildings of a special architectural design, would have been as natural and as reasonable a classification, for the purpose in view, as the classification made by this act.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment of the circuit court directing the issuance of the peremptory writ of mandamus should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Gantt, Ch. J., and Brace and Valliant, JJ., concur. Burgess and Marshall, JJ., concur specially. Sherwood, J., not being present at the hearing, takes no part in the decision.

Marshall, J., concurring:

I agree to the affirmance of the judgment of the trial court upon the grounds: First, that the act considered is clearly class legislation, and therefore unconstitutional; and, second, that the act is incomplete, and is not a law, and does not constitute a rule of conduct, and is therefore void. I do not agree that what is commonly termed an "occupation tax," which, properly expressed, means a license or permission to do business, is in any proper sense a tax. Such license fees have always been held constitutional in Missouri and elsewhere, provided they apply equally to all persons similarly situated.

NORTHPORT WESLEYAN GROVE CAMP-MEETING ASSOCIATION.

v.

Chester PERKINS.

(.....Me.....)

A camp-meeting association which has made perpetual leases of cottages on its grounds, without any restriction except that they are "subject to such rules and regulations as the association may from time to time adopt," and which also owns a store on the grounds which it has leased for a rental cannot impose a revenue tax on the business of taking orders for fruit, groceries, and provisions from cottagers upon the grounds of the association.

REPORT upon an agreed statement of facts by the Supreme Judicial Court for Waldo County for the opinion of the full bench of an action brought to recover a license fee imposed by plaintiff for the privilege of selling provisions upon its grounds. Nonsuit granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. P. Thompson for plaintiff.

Messrs. Dunton & Dunton for defendant.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Wesleyan Grove Camp-Meeting Association was incorporated by special act of the legislature approved February 19, 1873, to be composed of the presiding elders of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the East Maine Conference, with the preachers under their charge, and with the tent masters from Methodist Episcopal societies. It was empowered to acquire real and personal property, and to sell the same, and "to establish such by-laws and regulations as are necessary for the further and proper management of their affairs, consistent with the laws of this state." The principal purpose of the incorporators was to acquire and manage real estate for camp-meeting purposes. The corporation afterwards acquired the fee in that tract of land in Northport known as the "Northport Camp Ground," and which is a well-known summer resort. It laid out this land into cottage lots, with streets, squares, etc., and has leased the most of these lots in perpetuum to the owners of cottages thereon. The most of the cottages on the lots thus perpetually leased are occupied by their owners or others during the summer season. The streets leading through and across the grounds are open to public travel, except during camp-meeting week, when toll is taken at the entrance to the grounds. The only restriction stated in the case as existing in the perpetual leases is that they are "subject to such rules and regulations as the association may from time to time adopt."

The defendant has a place of business outside of, but near, these grounds of the association, where he sells groceries, fruits, and provisions, mainly, of course, to the summer residents on the grounds. He has been wont to go round to the cottages occupied by his customers upon the grounds, and take orders for his goods, which orders he filled at his store outside the grounds, and then delivered the goods so ordered to his customers at their cottages on the grounds. In doing this, he passed over the streets on the grounds open (except during camp-meeting week) to public travel. The plaintiff association owned a store on the grounds for the sale of various goods, which it leased for a rental.

In 1898 the trustees of the association voted that "any person or persons taking any order or orders for goods, wares, merchandise, fruit, or produce, or peddling groceries, upon said grounds, shall pay the sum of $15 for the season." The defendant was duly apprised of this new rule, but continued to visit his customers upon the grounds, and take their orders for goods, and refused to pay the $15. This action is to recover that sum.

The question raised by the parties in the statement of the case is whether the trustees can lawfully impose this revenue tax on the business of taking orders for fruit, groceries, and provisions from cottagers upon the grounds of the association; there being no suggestion of any other purpose of the vote.

It is common knowledge that it is now an almost universal practice in cities, villages, and summer resorts for dealers in such articles to go or send to the residences of the customers for orders for goods to be delivered there. The great convenience and comfort of this practice to families, especially those in summer cottages, are obvious. If the trustees of the plaintiff association can impose a revenue tax on that practice, they can make the tax so high as to break it up, and compel the occupants of the cottages on the lots held by them under perpetual leases to trade exclusively with some favored dealer on the grounds, or to go some distance to find a dealer outside of the grounds. Clearly, the cottagers cannot be subjected to such arbitrary power, unless it is plainly expressed in the terms of the leases under which they occupy. The only condition or restriction in the leases stated in the case is that they are "subject to such rules and regulations as the association may from time to time adopt." What the context might show we do not know. We are confined to the particular extract stated.

We think that condition or restriction imports only rules and regulations of a police nature, such as may be adopted for the preservation or improvement of the health, morals, religion, comfort, and convenience of all the occupants of the grounds. We do not think it can be extended to include an indefinite power to impose taxes directly or indirectly upon the cottagers at the discretion of the trustees, or even to abridge their comfort or convenience for mere purposes of revenue to the association, when the enjoyment of that comfort or convenience is in no way hurtful to the health, morals, religious sentiment, comfort, or convenience of that particular community.

It is argued that the tax is imposed upon the grocer, not on the cottager, and that the association is under no obligation to the grocer, and can exclude him from the grounds entirely, or impose upon him any conditions of entrance, including the payment of a revenue license fee.

The power of the association is not so absolute as that. It has laid out its grounds into lots, streets, and squares, and has invited people to take leases of lots, build cottages thereon, and occupy them as residents. It has thrown open the streets and squares to the free use of all persons occupying the cottages, or having business or social relations with the cottagers, at all times, except during camp-meeting week, when a toll is charged at the entrance. This state of things has existed for more than twenty years. While, as before stated, the association has retained full power to make reasonable rules and regulations of a police nature, it has not apparently reserved, if it ever possessed, the power to prevent the use of the streets by the cottagers, or by those having business or social relations with them, or to impose a tax for such use in the ordinary intercourse of life, or, in other words, to shut off, or impose revenue conditions upon, the intercourse of the cottagers with the rest of the town or state.

It is again argued that the charter gave the association authority "to establish such by-laws and regulations as are necessary for the further and proper management of their affairs," and that license fees like that imposed in this case are necessary for requisite revenue. Granting, for the purpose of the argument only, that in making its leases and opening its streets, etc., the association might have reserved the power to impose such license fees as conditions or restrictions, it does not appear to have done so. The rights of the cottagers in their cottages and in the streets, and to the use of them for business and social intercourse, acquired under the perpetual lease of the lots, cannot now be abridged without their consent, to enable the association to raise a revenue. A corporation has no power to adopt rules or regulations injuriously affecting the rights of others under prior contracts, by annexing conditions not embraced in the contracts. Illinois Conference Female College v. Cooper, 25 Ill. 148.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Re Opening of ORKNEY STREET.

(194 Pa. 425.)

Property abutting on a previously opened portion of a street constituting a cul de sac cannot be assessed for benefits to pay the cost of an extension which will convert the cul de sac into an open street, as the owners, by dedication or otherwise, have already borne their full share of the cost of the original improvement, and cannot be assessed again to pay the cost of extending that improvement through other properties.

(January 29, 1900.)

A PPEAL by the City of Philadelphia from a judgment of the Superior Court affirming an order of the Court of Quarter Sessions for Philadelphia County sustaining exceptions by abutting owners to the action of the jury in assessing damages upon their property for the opening of a highway. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Superior Court, which was as follows:

"Prior to these proceedings, Orkney street was laid out upon the confirmed plan of the city of Philadelphia, and, according to the plan, extended from Ontario to Westmoreland; but a portion of it, running through land of Broklehurst and Ewing, had not been opened. The result was that the properties of these exceptants were upon a cul de sac. It does not affirmatively appear that they had been assessed for the cost of the opening of the street to Broklehurst's and Ewing's land, but we are left to infer from what is stated in the opinion of the court below and at bar that the owners had dedicated the land over which that portion of the street extends. At all events, it was a paved and curbed street, and open to public travel from Ontario street to the point above mentioned, long before the adoption of the ordinance about to be referred to. An ordinance was adopted opening the street through its entire length to Westmoreland, and viewers were appointed to assess the damages of Broklehurst and Ewing. They reported that these were $4,400, and that of this sum the sum of $1,333.24 should be paid by the city, and the balance should be paid by the property owners on the previously opened portion of the street, for benefits. The question is as to the validity of these assessments for benefits.

"If this had been an open street throughout its entire length from Ontario to Westmoreland, and one end had been closed by vacation proceedings, these exceptants would have had a right in law to claim damages. Why? Because by reason of the closing of the street they would have sustained an injury in their property rights peculiar to themselves, and different in kind from the injury which would have been sustained by those who used the street for travel only. 'The injury is not of the same kind, differing in degree only. It is an additional injury, caused by the impairment of an entirely distinct right,—the special right of ingress and egress.' Re Melon Street, 182 Pa. 397, 38 L. R. A. 275, 38 Atl. 482. This being so, it is argued that the converse of the proposition must be true, namely, that the conversion of the cul de sac into an open street, thus giving two modes of access to their properties where only one existed before, was, or at least may have been, a peculiar benefit, different in kind, and not merely in degree, from that accruing to properties fronting on another street, or on another block of the same street. But, before pursuing this line of argument further, it will be well to consider whether or not the liability of properties, situate as these are, to special assessments to pay the cost of public improvements, is an open one, and whether another principle does not enter into the case. In Re Morewood Avenue, 159 Pa. 20, 28 Atl. 123, 132, Mr. Justice Green, after an exhaustive review of the earlier cases, including Re Hancock Street, 18 Pa. 20, which is much relied on here, states the doctrine established by them in this way: 'As we have repeatedly decided, the doctrine of assessment for benefits to pay for public improvements can only be defended upon the ground that the benefits are local, and essentially peculiar to the very property assessed, and then it can only be done once. This can only be the case when the property assessed abuts directly upon the line of the improvement. Having their own burdens to bear in this respect, the owners cannot be subjected to the discharge of similar burdens upon other properties, whether situate on the same street or in the same neighborhood.' The rule as thus stated was reiterated in Re Fifty-fourth Street, 165 Pa. 8, 30 Atl. 503,—a case of grading, paving, and curbing, where the property assessed abutted on the same street, but not on the part improved. It is to be noticed, also, that it was alleged on the argument of that case that the only outlet for the property was over part of the improvement; but this allegation was not referred to in the opinion, as it doubtless would have been if the supreme court had deemed it sufficient to distinguish the case from Re Morewood Avenue. The order sustaining the exception to the assessment was affirmed upon the ground that, as the property did not abut directly upon the line of the improvement, it was not subject to an assessment for benefits. Re Morewood Avenue has been followed, and the principle upon which it was decided applied to sewer assessments, notwithstanding the argument that a public sewer is a special benefit to all the properties situate in the same watershed. Re Park Avenue Sewers, 169 Pa. 433, 32 Atl. 574; Witman v. Reading, 169 Pa. 375, 32 Atl. 576; Re Beechwood Avenue Sewer, 179 Pa. 490, 36 Atl. 209. We may also refer in passing to the case of Speer v. Pittsburg, 166 Pa. 86, 30 Atl. 1013, where it was held that the words, 'majority in interest and number of owners of property abutting on the line of the proposed improvement' (act May 16, 1891 [Pub. Laws, 75] § 9), mean the majority on the portion of the street to be opened, and not the majority on the whole street. 'Any other construction,' said the court, 'would be contrary to the letter as well as manifest spirit of the act.' In Re Verona's Appeal, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 608, we followed the ruling in Re Morewood Avenue and applied it to a case precisely like the present. It is vain to argue that Re Morewood Avenue can only be regarded as a binding authority where the proceedings are under the act of 1891. It not only construes that act, but it also lays down a general rule, based upon a consideration of the nature of local assessments for public improvements, and of the limitations of the power of the legislature in that regard, which, although the act were as broad in terms as the act of April 1, 1864 (Pub. Laws, 206), would defeat any assessment of nonabutting property for paving or sewerage, or other improvement of the same kind. If these cases are to be distinguished from the present, it must be on some other ground than that the act of 1864 authorizes such assessments, and that the act of 1891 does not.

"It is argued that assessments for street openings are in a different class from assessments for sewers, and for grading, paving, and curbing, and that, in laying down the rule quoted at the outset of this opinion, the supreme court has no thought of including assessments of the former class. We do not think we would be warranted in denying application of the rule to the present case upon any such assumption. The ruling was made, said Mr. Justice Green, 'after much deliberation and the most mature consideration.' Re Fifty-fourth Street, 165 Pa. 8, 30 Atl. 503. And, whilst it is true that all of the street-opening cases were not referred to in the opinion, yet it is also true that the leading case upon that subject was critically examined and reviewed. Speaking of that case (Re Hancock Street, 18 Pa. 26), the court said that the constitutional question whether the act was void as to lots located away from the line of the improvement was neither discussed nor decided; and, even if the case had decided that such lots could be assessed for benefits, it would have to be regarded as practically overruled by the later case of Re Washington Avenue, 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255, in which the question was met and decided the other way. Re Chestnut Avenue, 68 Pa. 81, and Re Main Street, 37 Pa. 590, 20 Atl. 711, were not referred to; but, judging from the reports of those cases, the remark that the constitutional question under consideration was neither discussed nor decided would apply as well to them as to the Hancock Street Case.

"It may be said that the constitutional question did not necessarily arise in the Morewood Avenue Case. Possibly not. But it was raised by counsel, and, after a thorough consideration of it, the court decided it. When liability of nonabutting property to assessment is defended against upon constitutional as well as statutory grounds, and both grounds of defense are held to be good by the court of last resort, and either of those questions arises in a later case, will any other state court be justified in holding that the precedent is not of binding authority in that case, because, forsooth, the decision might have been based on the other ground exclusively? We think it more in accordance with sound principle to say that the general rule upon the subject laid down by the supreme court in such a case ought to be followed by all the other courts of the state until it is modified or qualified, unless it can be shown that the particular case for decision differs in essential facts, is clearly not within the reason of the rule, and therefore presumably was not intended to be embraced within the rule itself. Is this such a case? Granting, for the sake of the argument, that it is not within the reason of the first branch of the rule, what is to be said of the application of the second branch? It may well be that the properties of the exceptants are enhanced in value by the opening of the street through to Westmoreland street; and, in view of the decision in the Melon Street Case, it would seem inconsistent to declare, as a matter of law, that the additional mode of ingress and egress that is to be given is in no sense a special benefit. But there remains the objection that, by dedication or otherwise, these properties were made to bear their full share of the cost of the original improvement. Can they be assessed again to pay the cost of extending that improvement through other properties? Can a street be opened piecemeal, and the properties abutting on the part first opened be assessed for benefits to pay the cost of extending the improvement a second or a third time? The repaving of a street is, in a sense, a special benefit to the properties abutting on it, but it is settled beyond all controversy that it cannot be done at their expense. Hannett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146, 3 Am. Rep. 615; Williamsport v. Beck, 128 Pa. 147, 18 Atl. 329. The same is true of the extension of a pavement. What is the distinction? We are unable to answer these questions in accordance with the appellant's contention, and at the same time reconcile the decision with the rule laid down in Re Morwood Avenue, and followed by us in Verona's Appeal. If that rule is to be modified, we do not think it will be done upon the ground that an assessment according to benefits in a grading and paving case is so different in essential particulars from a similar assessment in a street-opening case that in the former case a property abutting on the street can be assessed but once for the improvement, whilst in the latter case it may be assessed and reassessed as often as the street is extended. It seems to us that the rule is a general one, and ordinarily is as applicable in one case as in the other. Whilst the decision in the Melon Street Case does suggest a possible distinction, yet it does not distinguish the two classes of cases in every particular. If for this or any other reason the rule is to be modified, and exceptions recognized, our duty to wait until it is done by the supreme court is plain. An opposite course, even if we were disposed to adopt it, would simply lead to confusion. We conclude, therefore, that the learned judge of the court below was right in holding that the cases above cited were of binding authority, and were applicable to the present case, notwithstanding the fact that the proceedings were under the act of 1864, and not the act of 1891. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to express any opinion upon the question as to the authority of the jury to go on with the proceedings after the next term succeeding their appointment, without a formal continuance of the order made during that term. Order affirmed."

Messrs. John L. Kinsey, Norris S. Barratt, and James Alcorn, for appellant:

The legislature may in proceedings to open a street authorize the assessment of benefits against property benefited though it does not abut upon the portion of the street opened.

In most, if not all, of the cases which declare the assessment of benefits invalid, it was not because the property was nonabutting, but because the act of assembly did not authorize such benefits, or the method of their assessment was illegal, or the improvement was of such a public character that no local or special enhancement in value occurred to the property assessed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

W. H. CARSON

v.

SEWERAGE COMMISSIONERS OF BROCKTON.

(.....Mass.....)

1. An assessment of an annual charge for the use of a common sewer under Pub. Stat. chap. 50, §§ 1-3, authorizing just and equitable annual charges or rents for the use of such sewers to be paid by everyone who enters his sewer into the common sewer, is not unconstitutional because of the fact that the person assessed therefor had previously paid part of the cost of building the sewer, if the assessment for its use is proportional to, and not in excess of, the benefits received therefrom.

2. An ordinance fixing the rate per thousand gallons to be paid for discharging a sewer from private premises into a common sewer is not invalid for failure to provide for a hearing on the question as to the rate to be fixed, although there is a mere possibility that the rate fixed may in fact exceed the benefit received.

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to quash an assessment of annual charge for use of a sewer. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. Carson in propria persona.

Mr. F. M. Bixby, for respondents:

It has always been recognized that cities have the right to charge for water supplied by them to its takers.

Parker v. Boston, 1 Allen, 361.

Why is it not as legal to charge for disposing of it?

Holmes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of quashing the assessment of an annual charge for the use of a common sewer. The assessment was authorized by Stat. 1892, chap. 245, § 1, and by an ordinance in pursuance of that section. It is objected that both statute and ordinance are unconstitutional.

By the statute, the city council of any city except Boston, or a town with sewers laid out under Pub. Stat. chap. 50, §§ 1-3, or with a system of sewerage under § 7, may establish just and equitable annual charges or rents for the use of such sewers, to be paid by everyone who enters his sewer into the common sewer. The ordinance charges for "unmetered" water service $8, and for "metered" water service 30 cents per thousand gallons of sewage delivered to the sewer, but no charge to be less than $8, subject to certain possible discounts. It is argued that the statute is subject to the objections which prevailed in Sears v. Boston Street Comrs. 173 Mass. 350, 53 N. E. 876, that the charge is a tax which properly should be borne by the public generally, and that there are no provisions for a hearing.

We are of opinion that the petitioner received special benefit for which he might be charged, and that this case is free from the elements which in Sears v. Boston Street Comrs. led to the conclusion that the petitioner was assessed without regard to the benefits received by him. No one denies that it was a special benefit to the petitioner to have a sewer built in front of his land. That benefit was the probability that the sewer would be available for use in the future. But the city, by building it and receiving a part of the cost from the petitioner, did not impliedly bind itself or the general taxes that the sewer should be maintained forever, and that the petitioner should be at liberty to use it free of further expense. If building a sewer was a special benefit, keeping the sewer in condition for use by such further expenditure as was necessary was a further special benefit to such as used it.

The charge allowed by the act is a charge for using the sewer,—a benefit distinct from that originally conferred by building it. By the statute, the charge must be a “just and equitable” charge. These words have been held insufficient to save the constitutionality of a statute in State, New Brunswick Rubber Co., Prosecutor, v. Commissioners of Streets and Sewers, 38 N. J. L. 190, 20 Am. Rep. 380, and in Burnes v. Dyer, 56 Vt. 469. But the facts of those cases were too different to make them conclusive. Here the words are applied solely to those who actually use the sewer. Therefore the benefit to the parties assessed is established. The assessment, in order to be equitable, must be proportional to the benefit, and not in excess of it. The words in this connection sufficiently express an intent to confine the charge within constitutional limits. They are so construed by the ordinance; for by the ordinance the charge is in proportion to the extent of the use, which is a reasonable way of estimating the extent of the benefit received. See Parker v. Boston, 1 Allen, 361, 367. There is no charge unless the sewer is used. The charge to the plaintiff was $42.53, and therefore, under the terms of the ordinance which we have stated, must have been determined by meter.

It is said that there is no provision for a hearing. But, under the ordinance, the only questions are whether the petitioner's sewer enters the common sewer, and what amount of sewage is shown by the meter readings to have been delivered to the sewer. If the petitioner wished to be heard on either of these facts, no doubt he could resort to the courts. On the rate per thousand gallons fixed by the ordinance, he was not entitled to be heard. So far as appears, if he is dissatisfied with the rate, he is not obliged to use the sewer. But if he were compelled by law to use it, and to pay, as now, for the use (Stat. 1890, chap. 132), and recognizing, as we must, the possibility that, in spite of the meaning which we attribute to the statute, the rate fixed by the ordinance might be in excess of the benefit received, still, in our opinion, the act and ordinance would be valid notwithstanding that mere possibility, in the absence of any allegation that the rate fixed did exceed in fact the benefit received. In cases of this sort, the petitioner has no right of appeal to a jury. Howe v. Cambridge, 114 Mass. 388. The final decision must be somewhere, and may as well be left to the city council as to anyone. New London Northern R. Co. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 102 Mass. 386-388. If it is left to them, they are not obliged to hear the several parties who may be affected before fixing a general rate. Clearly, the rate might have been fixed by the legislature without a hearing. Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 45, 42 L. ed. 943, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 521. And whatever differences there may be between the legislature of the state and inferior, although legislative, bodies, in cases where particular property is to be valued, still, when a uniform and self-adjusting rate is adopted, under which no question as to proportion can arise, or any other question except the general one whether the rate is high, we are of opinion that the legislature has power to authorize a city council to determine that question, as it has done here. United States v. New Orleans, 98 U. S. 381, 25 L. ed. 225; Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307, sub nom. Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 29 L. ed. 636, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 334, 338, 1191; Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 358, 31 L. ed. 763, 767, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 459, 33 L. ed. 970, 982, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462, 702; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 394, 38 L. ed. 1014, 1022, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1047. See, further, Leominster v. Conant, 139 Mass. 384, 2 N. E. 690.

If, under the pretense of fixing an equitable rate, the ordinance should do what amounted to the taking or destruction of property, very possibly that might afford a ground for judicial interference, as in other cases where the legislature fixes rates. Smyth v. Ames, 109 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U. S. 649, 39 L. ed. 567, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 484; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. v.

Annie B. WELCH.

(.....Mass.....)

1. Ordinary care is not the full measure of the duty of one who arranges a roof and gutter in such a way that the first will collect water and the second discharge it through an aperture upon a neighbor's land.
2. One who causes the fall of a wall on a neighbor's land by allowing water collected from a roof to be discharged through an aperture in a gutter upon the other's land is not relieved from liability for the damage because of the fact that the wall was not well constructed.

(June 30, 1899.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for the unlawful casting of water upon plaintiff's land which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. F. Farrell for defendant.

Mr. W. Frederick Kimball, for plaintiff:

No man has a right so to construct his roof that it will discharge upon his neighbor's land water which would not naturally fall there, or to cause the water which collects on his roof in rain or snow to be discharged upon his neighbor's land either in a current, stream, or drops. A roof is a non-natural or artificial structure for the convenience of its owner, and the owner allows the water to collect thereon at his peril, and if it flows upon the land or structure of his neighbor, the owner of the roof is liable for all damage.

NOTE.—As to liability for injury by surface water, see Tremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Harlin (Neb.) 86 L. R. A. 417.

Shipley v. Fifty Associates, 106 Mass. 194; Washb. Easem. 390; Reynolds v. Clarke, 2 Id. Raym. 1399; Martin v. Simpson, 6 Allen, 102; Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265; Gould, Waters, 2d ed. § 293, p. 551; Copper v. Dolvin, 68 Iowa, 757, 56 Am. Rep. 872, 28 N. W. 59; 1 Wood, Nuisances, §§ 96-111 and cases cited.

The owner of the roof is liable, although the neighbor's wall upon which the water fell was not well built.

Gould v. McKenna, 86 Pa. 297, 27 Am. Rep. 705.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's case was that water flowing from the roof of the defendant's stable into a gutter along the side of the stable was discharged upon the plaintiff's land in large quantities through an aperture in the gutter, and thus did the damage for which suit is brought. If these were the facts, a ruling that the defendant was bound to use only ordinary care properly was refused.

One who arranges a roof and gutter in such a way that the first will collect water, and the second manifestly will discharge it upon a neighbor's land unless prevented, has notice that he threatens harm to his neighbor of a kind which the law, in its adjustment of their conflicting interests does not permit him knowingly to inflict. Bates v. Westborough, 151 Mass. 174, 181, 7 L. R. A. 156, 23 N. E. 1070. The danger is so manifest, so constant, and so great that although, no doubt, a possibility of harm does not always require more than the exercise of ordinary care to prevent it (Quinn v. Crimings, 171 Mass. 255, 42 L. R. A. 101, 50 N. E. 624), and although in some states only ordinary care is required in cases like this (Underwood v. Waldron, 33 Mich. 232, 238, 239; Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 55, 20 Am. Rep. 164), the requirement here and elsewhere is higher, and sometimes is stated as absolute, to prevent at one's peril the harm from coming to pass (Shipley v. Fifty Associates, 106 Mass. 194, 199; Jutte v. Hughes, 67 N. Y. 267, 272).

If the defendant is liable, she is liable for damage to artificial structures upon the plaintiff's land (Copper v. Dolvin, 68 Iowa, 757, 56 Am. Rep. 872, 28 N. W. 59; Martin v. Simpson, 6 Allen, 102, 105; and cases below); and, if the discharge of water caused the wall to fail, she is liable for it, whether the wall was well constructed or not. The request which was refused would have exonerated the defendant if the wall was ill constructed, even though the bad construction did not contribute to the damage. It is not necessary to consider this question more nicely, as it appears that full instructions were given, and the only exception is to the refusal of the defendant's request. Underwood v. Waldron, 33 Mich. 232, 236, 237; Gould v. McKenna, 86 Pa. 297, 27 Am. Rep. 705.

Exceptions overruled.

(147 Mo. 467.)

1. The construction of a street, and its maintenance for a term of years at a cost sufficient to preserve good work and good material from becoming imperfect from natural and unavoidable causes, may be included in a single contract by a municipality having complete control over the construction and repair of its streets, where the object is to obtain a better quality of construction, although the charter provides for letting the contract for "repairs" to the lowest bidder, which are to be paid for out of the general fund, while the cost of construction is to be charged on adjoining property.

2. That the price for maintenance of a pavement is below what would be fair compensation for the work is not sufficient to avoid, in favor of the abutting owner, a contract covering its construction and maintenance, under a charter requiring the city to pay for maintenance and the abutting owner for construction, where there is nothing to show that the contract price for construction is not fair and reasonable, and the contract is in fact but for a single work,—that of construction with a guaranty of endurance.

3. The fraudulent purpose of the public authorities in fixing the minimum price to be paid for maintaining at public expense a pavement constructed at the expense of the abutting owner, both of which items are included in a single contract, so low that an unlawful burden will be cast on the abutting owner, will not, after the completion of the pavement, defeat the contractor's right to recover on the tax bill, unless he participates in the fraud.

4. An undertaking to maintain a new pavement for a series of years, required as a guaranty of the perfection of the work, is

Macfarlane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover the amount of a special tax bill assessed against the property of defendants in favor of the Barber Asphalt Company, and assigned to plaintiff. The petition charges that the assessment was made pursuant to authority of ordinance No. 16,943, approved November 26, 1893, which provides for the reconstruction of Grand avenue, upon which defendants' said property abuts. The answer is in the nature of a cross bill in equity. It sets out in detail the provisions of the charter of the city of St. Louis, the general ordinance providing for the construction and reconstruction of streets, and the proceedings under which the improvement of Grand avenue was made. It charges that for various specified reasons, which will be stated in the opinion, the ordinances, contract, and tax bill are null and void, and prays that the tax bill be set aside. The reply is, in effect, a general denial of the new matter charged in the answer.

The case was tried upon the facts, most of which were agreed upon. Judgment was for defendants, and plaintiff appealed to the St. Louis court of appeals, where it was affirmed on authority of the decision of this court in the case of Verdin v. St. Louis, 131 Mo. 32, 33 S. W. 480, and 36 S. W. 52. Afterwards, on motion for a rehearing, the appeal was certified to this court, 144 Mo. 407, 46 S. W. 201, on account of a supposed conflict between that decision and the later decision in the case of Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Ullman, 137 Mo. 543, 38 S. W. 458.

The following is a summary of the charter provisions, the ordinances, and proceedings under which the improvement of Grand avenue, which resulted in the tax bill, was made, as the same appears from the agreed statement of facts and from the evidence:

Section 27, art. 6, of the charter provides: "The assembly shall have no power directly to contract for any public work or improvement, or repairs thereof, contemplated by this charter, or to fix the price or rate therefor; but the board of public improvements shall, in all cases, except in case of necessary repairs requiring prompt attention, prepare and submit to the assembly estimates of costs of any proposed work, and, under the direction of the ordinance, shall advertise for bids, as provided for purchases by the commissioner of supplies, and let out said work by contract to the lowest responsible bidder subject to the approval of the council. Any other mode of letting out work shall be held as illegal and void."

Section 18 of said article 6 requires "the repairs of all streets" to be paid for out of the general revenue of the city, and the paving of all streets to be "charged upon the adjoining property as a special tax," not exceeding the amount of 25 per cent of its assessed value.

By § 26, art. 3, the mayor and assembly are given the most ample power and control over the streets of the city, and general authority to construct, pave, and keep them in repair.

General ordinance 564 (the same as 542, considered in the Verdin Case) provides, in detail, for letting contracts for street construction, and for what the contract shall require. Among other matters, it provides: "Whenever a street is to be improved, either on the motion of the board of public improvements or on petition of the adjoining property owners, the board of public improvements may submit to the municipal assembly a bill for letting in one contract the work of constructing or reconstructing such street and of maintaining it in good condition for a term of years; and after such bill has become a law the board of public improvements shall advertise for proposals including the construction or reconstruction and maintenance under the same regulations as are provided for the improvement of streets; but the advertisement shall, in addition to what is prescribed for other street improvements, state the term during which the street is to be maintained in good condition." It requires further: "The contract shall provide that the obligation of the contractor to maintain the streets in good condition shall commence one year after the completion and acceptance of the work of construction or reconstruction, and the contract price shall be paid semiannually out of the city treasury, on the certificate of the street commissioner that the work has been performed in accordance with the contract and specifications."

In canvassing the proposals, the lowest bid is required to be ascertained "by taking the aggregate amount of the cost of construction or reconstruction, as the case may be, and the total cost of maintenance, for the term of years designated by the ordinance."

The board of public improvement submitted to the assembly, and that body passed and the mayor approved, a special ordinance (No. 16,942) for the improvement of Grand avenue between St. Louis avenue and Montgomery street. Section 1 of this ordinance directs the board of public improvements to cause Grand avenue, from St. Louis avenue to Montgomery street, to be reconstructed with the best quality of Trinidad Lake asphalt, and to contract for the maintenance thereof for a period of nine years, commencing one year after the work of reconstruction is completed and accepted. Sections 2 and 3 recited the specifications, and are unimportant in this contest. Section 4 provides for a lien for the cost of reconstruction against abutting property. Section 5 makes an appropriation for the cost of reconstruction above 25 per cent of the assessed value of the abutting property; while § 6, the last of the ordinance, makes an appropriation, in general terms, out of a fund set 48 L. R. A.

apart for street repairs—"reconstructed streets"—for the cost of maintenance.

Pursuant to the mandate of this ordinance, the board of public improvements advertised to let the authorized work to bidders under letting notice No. 3,844, "for reconstructing, with best quality of Trinidad Lake asphalt, Grand avenue, from St. Louis avenue to Montgomery street, and for the maintenance of the same. Deposit required $435. The street to be maintained in good condition for a term of nine years, beginning one year after the completion and acceptance of the work. Bond for $5,910 must be given for the maintenance in addition to the bond for reconstruction when contract is executed.

. . . Plans, specifications, and forms of contract may be seen at the office of the street commissioner." In response to this advertisement, there was but one bidder, either for the work of reconstruction or the maintenance, who was the Barber Asphalt Paving Company. Its bid was as follows:

Taking up old roadway.....	$ 1,379 00
New 6" curbing.....	1,680 00
Old curbing reset.....	10 00
Asphalt pavement on 6" concrete	11,820 00
Maintenance per annum.....	1,773 00

Total $16,662 00

Pursuant to this bid, the work was let to the Barber Asphalt Paving Company, and the contract entered into under date of February 9, 1893. The contract is very elaborate in the specifications of the required work, following the requirements of § 564. The contract contains this agreement in regard to maintenance: "The said the Barber Asphalt Paving Company, party of the first part, expressly guarantees to maintain at grade and surface in good order the aforesaid work of reconstruction, for the full period of nine years, commencing one year after the said work of reconstruction is completed and accepted, and binds himself, his heirs and assigns, to make all repairs which may, from any imperfection in said work or materials, become necessary within that time; and the party of the first part shall, whenever notified by the street commissioner that repairs are required, at once make such repairs, at his own expense."

It appears from the evidence that, prior to 1883, the durability of new pavements was unsatisfactory, and the board concluded that a remedy could be secured by including in the contracts a requirement that the contractor should maintain his work for a term of years. In order to enforce this remedy, the assembly, in 1883, passed an ordinance which is now § 564 of the general ordinances of the city. Since the adoption of this ordinance, all contracts for construction and reconstruction of streets has contained a maintenance clause similar to the one found in this contract, and all contracts have been let in the manner required by the ordinance. The evidence shows that there was an unwritten agreement or understanding among the members of the board of public improvements that no bid for maintenance should be accepted which was in excess of 50 cents per square per annum. This rule was never promulgated by an order of the board or put upon record in any form, but was an unwritten rule, which was uniformly enforced. There was no direct evidence that the contractors were notified of this rule, but as bids for maintenance thereafter seldom, if ever, went beyond the amount so fixed, and so far as appears no bid for a greater amount was ever accepted, it may be inferred that contractors were advised thereof. Mr. Fladd and Mr. McMath, who had been members of the board, testified as witnesses in regard to the adequacy of the price fixed for the maintenance of streets newly paved. Mr. McMath was of the opinion that 50 cents per square had not compensated contractors for maintenance. It appears that he opposed the rule. Mr. Fladd was of the opinion, from his knowledge and experience, that the price fixed for maintenance was generally reasonable and adequate, but in some cases was not. "It was about the best we could do."

The objections made to the tax bills by the answer in this case are in most particulars the same as those stated in the petition in the Verdin Case. For full statement, see report of that case. The provisions of the charter, the ordinances, the advertisement for proposals, and the manner of ascertaining the lowest bidder, as charged in the petition, were, in every material particular, the same as were shown by the evidence in the trial of this case. The petition in that case charged that 50 cents per square per annum would not compensate the contractor for maintaining the work for ten years, and the bid for construction was made proportionately higher, in order to secure fair compensation for the entire contract, by which an unjust and illegal charge was imposed upon the property. In this case we have the evidence bearing upon that charge. In the Verdin Case, upon the facts stated in the petition, the truth of which the demurrer admitted, the contract was held invalid. By their answer defendants, for the same reason, charge the invalidity of this contract. The question in this case must be determined from the evidence.

1. It appears very conclusively from the ordinances, the advertisement for bids, the bids made by the Barber Asphalt Paving Company, the terms of the contract, and the other evidence, when taken together, that the obligation required of the contractor to maintain the completed work was intended to secure an improvement that would endure for ten years without reconstruction, and at the same time to avoid casting upon the property owner the burden of bearing the cost that might necessarily be incurred in securing such durability. The obligation imposed upon the contractor to maintain his work was clearly intended to constitute a part of the original contract for the reconstruction of the street, and was not intended as a contract for repairing streets which were not good enough for use and were not bad enough for reconstruction. This purpose appears very clearly from the known evils the ordinances were intended to remedy, the terms of the advertisement for proposals and the stipulations contained in the contract. Under the contract, the Asphalt Paving Company guarantees the work for nine years, and binds himself to make "all repairs which may, from any imperfection of the work or materials, become necessary within that time."

The question, then, is whether or not the municipal authorities had the power to require the guaranty found in this contract, and, if they had such power, was the manner of exercising it violative of the constitutional or charter rights of the landowner whose property is chargeable with the cost of reconstruction. In the Verdin Case, upon the facts stated in the petition, it was held that the requirement of § 542 (which is the same as § 564 of the general ordinances as revised), that the contractor should maintain the pavement for a term of years, could not be distinguished from a contract for "repairs," within the meaning of § 27 of article 6 of the charter; that a contract for repairs is required to be let to the lowest bidder, and therefore § 564 of the general ordinances, authorizing a contract for reconstruction and maintenance to be let together to the lowest average bidder, was in violation of said section of the charter, and the contract was null and void. Since the decision in the Verdin Case, this court has held (Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Ullman, 137 Mo. 543, 38 S. W. 458) that an agreement by a contractor to maintain, at his own cost for five years, a pavement he had contracted to construct, was not an agreement to make repairs on a street, within the meaning of a charter (Rev. Stat. 1889, § 1424) which required that "the cost of repairing and keeping in repair the paving and macadamizing of all streets and avenues shall be paid out of the general revenue of the city." Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Ullman, 137 Mo. 543, 38 S. W. 463.

The general powers granted St. Louis over its streets are very comprehensive. "The mayor and assembly shall have power by ordinance to establish, open, vacate, alter, widen, extend, pave, or otherwise improve and sprinkle all streets, avenues, sidewalks, alleys, wharves, and public ground and squares, and provide for the payment of the costs and expenses thereof in the manner in this charter prescribed; and also to provide for grading, lighting, cleaning, and repairing the same, and to condemn private property for public uses, as provided for in this charter; to construct and keep in repair all bridges, streets," etc., "and to regulate the use thereof." These broad grants imply the power to make all necessary contracts for grading and paving its streets, and keeping them in repair, unless such powers are restrained by special provisions of the charter or by constitutional limitations. There would seem to be no doubt that, under these general powers, the municipality would have the same right, in order to secure good and durable work, to require of the contractor any guaranties that a private person might take in order to secure the perfection of work done for him. Municipal officers who, in contracting for such public work, should neglect to take from a contractor some kind of guaranty of the perfection of the work and materials, would be derelict in their duty, and unfitted for the trust with which they had been invested. The kind of guaranty should be left to their discretion and business sense. We think no wiser or more adequate provision for securing perfection in the completed work could be devised than that of requiring the contractor to maintain it for a reasonable time, at such cost as would compensate for the repairs necessary to preserve good work and good material from becoming imperfect from natural and unavoidable causes. Morse v. West Port, 110 Mo. 509, 19 S. W. 831.

We are able to discover nothing in § 27 of article 6 of the charter which prohibits such a guaranty. The restraint placed upon the assembly is that it shall not directly contract for making repairs of streets. It requires that "proposed work" (which includes repairs) shall be let to the lowest bidder. It also requires estimates of the cost of such work to be submitted to the assembly by the board of public improvements. It is manifest that the repairs contemplated in this section are such as are needed at the time the ordinance authorizing the work is passed. It is "proposed work," and estimates thereof must be made. The charter does not prohibit a contract for the work necessary to preserve in good condition the improved street, or, in other words, a guaranty of the efficiency of the completed work. The general powers conferred by the charter give ample authority to require of contractors such guaranties, and no prohibition is found, or necessarily implied, in § 27 of article 6. The validity of the ordinances should be presumed, and the ordinances upheld, unless a repugnance to the charter clearly appears.

2. But it is said, in the next place, that the contract is void for the reason that the methods provided by ordinance, and followed in the advertisements for bids and in the contract, impose upon the property owner burdens which are unauthorized by the charter; that, under the charter, the property adjacent to the street is only chargeable with the cost of the constructed pavement, and the cost of repairs are payable out of the general revenue of the city; and letting a contract for paving the street, and one for maintaining it, under one bid, gives the contractor and the city the opportunity, by collusion, to impose upon the property a part of the cost of maintenance. It is argued that this result was reached in this case, for, counsel say, it is shown that the price for maintenance was required to be taken at a rate below what would be fair compensation for that work, and the price for reconstruction was therefore made proportionately higher, in order to secure fair compensation for the entire work. Admitting, for argument, that 50 cents per square was not adequate compensation for maintaining the street, there was no evidence tending to prove that the contract price for reconstruction was not fair and reasonable. No complaint is made to the quality of the work or to the reasonableness of the contract price therefor. The landowner, except as a citizen and general taxpayer, is not interested in the cost of maintaining the work. No issue in this case involves his rights as a general taxpayer. The issue is really one of fraud and collusion, and the burden rests upon defendant to prove that, by letting the work of construction and of maintenance to the lowest average bidder, an unauthorized charge was imposed upon his property.

It may be said here that municipal officers, under the charter of St. Louis, are selected presumably on account of their fitness and integrity. They have no private ends to subserve. We should therefore presume that their intentions are honest, and that, in the performance of their public duties, they deal fairly and justly with the citizen and property owner. It should be kept in mind, also, that in matters of control over streets, and of keeping them in condition for public use, the authorities act in a business capacity, and much latitude of discretion should be allowed them in matters of detail. The charter powers in these particulars are general, and very broad, and matters of detail are necessarily left almost entirely to the discretion of those intrusted with the duty. Gibson v. Owens, 115 Mo. 267, 21 S. W. 1107. The ordinances under which Grand avenue was improved require the contractor to maintain his work for nine years, commencing one year after its completion. No one can doubt the wisdom of this requirement, looking at it from a business standpoint. The evidence shows that previous work of this kind had been wanting in durability. The most careful inspection of the construction of a pavement, as it progresses, will not detect all imperfections in the materials and in the manner of construction. This the board of public improvement had learned from experience. They believed that a street, paved in a proper manner with asphaltum, would not require reconstruction for ten years, if properly cared for and preserved. They recognized the fact that its preservation from the effects of use and natural decay would require constant attention and the expenditure of money and labor. In these circumstances, the ordinances were passed and the contract in question was made.

The ordinance requires the contractor to maintain his work for ten years. But the property is, under the charter, only chargeable with the work of reconstruction. Provision was therefore made for separating the cost of construction and the cost of maintenance, and requiring separate bids or estimates for each work. The contract was for but a single work; that is, of reconstruction, with a guaranty that the pavement would endure the ordinary uses for ten years. The lowest bidder is the person who offers to construct the pavement and maintain it in good condition for the requisite period. The ordinance provides for ascertaining the lowest bid for the entire contract of construction and maintenance as follows: "In canvassing the proposals, the lowest bid shall be ascertained by taking the aggregate of the cost of construction, or reconstruction, as the case may be, and the total cost of maintenance, for the term of years designated by the ordinance." No objection can be seen to this method; indeed, in no other way could the lowest bid be justly ascertained.

In canvassing the bids, the board has before it the estimates of construction and maintenance made by the engineer, together with the separate bids for construction and maintenance. If the bid for either work is too high, or if the aggregate bid is too high, the board has power to reject it. Assuming, as we must, that the board acts fairly between the city and the property owner, we are unable to see how the latter can be injured, unless the accepted bid makes the cost of reconstruction more than it ought to be. This result may follow the letting of a contract in any method imaginable, as long as contractors work in their own interest, and not wholly for the public good. The discretion must therefore be left with the municipal authorities, to whom the duty has been entrusted by the people.

3. But it is said that the board of public improvements fixed the cost of maintenance at 50 cents per square, which was inadequate, to preserve the pavement for ten years, and would accept no higher bid on that work; thus compelling the contractor to increase his bid for reconstruction in order to make the entire contract profitable. In answer to this, it may be said, as has already been said, that there is no evidence that the contract price for reconstruction is more than it should have been for the character of work required. Again, if the mode adopted for letting such contract is not in violation of the charter, then the contractor should not suffer on account of the fraudulent purpose of the board unless he participated in the fraud. Objections come too late after the improvement has been completed. Warren v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 115 Mo. 580, 22 S. W. 490.

But we do not think the evidence bears out the charge against the board. The board had the right, in its discretion, to reject a bid in which, in its judgment, the charge for maintenance was excessive. If the board, with its experience and information, and with the estimates before it, was unwilling to accept a bid in which the charge for maintenance was over 50 cents per square per annum, we can see no reason why contractors should not have been advised that bids in excess of that charge would not be considered. The only limitation on the discretion of the city authorities in contracting for such public works is that contracts shall be let to the lowest bidder. The rule adopted by the board does not prevent contractors from proposing to maintain their work for less than 50 cents per square. Two witnesses, who were members of the board when the rule was adopted, testified on the trial. Mr. McMath testified: "As near as I can recollect, the first thing I ever heard concerning this matter was in discussions of the board concerning the price at which maintenance had been let in the first contracts, and the opinion was expressed that $1 a square was too much; and, as near as I can recollect, Gen. Turner expressed the opinion that about 50 cents a square was about sufficient compensation for the keeping of all the pavements in repair; and that opinion of his seemed to be—was concurred in by the other members of the board. There never was any action taken whatsoever, so far as I have ever learned. I have examined the records. Probably a year ago I had occasion to. There is no record whatever of any formal action ever taken by the board in regard to that matter." This witness testified that, in his opinion, the sum of 50 cents has not compensated the contractor for the maintenance. Mr. Fladd testified that the members of the board concluded that they would not award a contract at more than 50 cents. He regarded that a reasonable price for maintenance. A majority of the board was evidently of the same opinion. There is nothing in the evidence tending to prove that the board did not act in good faith, for the best interests of all concerned, nor does the evidence tend to prove that an unjust burden was put upon the property of plaintiff by the proceedings followed in awarding the contract. In the Ullman Case, 137 Mo. 543, 38 S. W. 463, a contract was sustained which imposed the entire cost of maintenance for five years upon the adjacent property. In this case the cost of maintaining the pavement is paid by the city. The evidence, in our opinion, does not establish the complaint that the cost of reconstruction was rendered unjust on account of proceeding as directed by the ordinance and the rule followed by the board of public improvements.

Some other questions are discussed bearing upon the legality of the bid for maintenance. If the contract for reconstruction was fairly let to the lowest bidder, and the work was done in a proper manner, according to contract, defendant can have nothing of which to complain, as his property is not chargeable with the maintenance. Indeed, the maintenance clause of the contract is beneficial to the property owner if, as the board thought would be the case, a necessity of reconstruction would thereby be prevented for a longer period. Morse v. West Port, 110 Mo. 509, 19 S. W. 831. We distinguish this from the Verdin Case in the fact that the evidence shows that the word "maintenance," as used in the ordinance and contract, has not the same application as the word "repairs," used in the charter. The obligation to "maintain," required by the ordinance, is imposed as a mere guaranty of the perfection of the work when completed.

and the duty to preserve from decay and ordinary use. The work of "repairs," required by the charter to be let to the lowest bidder, is a restoration of a street already defective from use and decay. We distinguish the cases further, in the fact that it does not appear from the evidence in this case that the bid for construction was higher, on account of the maximum bid fixed by the board for maintenance, than it would have been for perfect work, without the guaranty. This case is also distinguishable from the Ullman Case, in that the landowner is not chargeable with the cost of maintenance. The judgment of the circuit court ought to be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Per Curiam:

The foregoing opinion, prepared by our late associate, Judge Macfarlane, is adopted as the opinion of the court. Sherwood, Robinson, Brace, and Williams, JJ., concurring therein. Gantt, Ch. J., and Burgess, J., dissenting. Marshall, J., not sitting.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to proceed in accordance with the views expressed in the opinion.

BARBER ASPHALT PAVING COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

Morris HEZEL et al., Respts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. The construction of a street and its maintenance for a term of years at a cost sufficient to preserve good work and good material from becoming imperfect from natural and unavoidable causes, may be included in a single contract by a municipality having complete control over the construction and repair of its streets where the object is to obtain a better quality of construction, although the charter provides for letting the contract for "repairs" to the lowest bidder, which are to be paid for out of the general fund, while the cost of construction is to be charged on adjoining property.
2. That the price for maintenance of a pavement is below what would be fair compensation for the work is not sufficient to avoid, in favor of the abutting owner, a contract covering its construction and maintenance, under a charter requiring the city to pay for maintenance and the abutting owner for construction, where there is nothing to show that the contract price for construction was not fair and reasonable, and the contract is in fact but for a single work,—that of construction with a guaranty of endurance.
3. The fraudulent purpose of the public authorities in fixing the minimum price to be paid for maintaining at public expense a pavement constructed at the expense of the abutting owner, both of which items are included in a single contract, so low that an unlawful burden will be cast on the abutting owner, will not, after the completion of the pavement, defeat the contractor's right to recover on the tax bills, unless he participates in the fraud.

4. An undertaking to maintain a new pavement for a series of years, required as a guaranty of the perfection of the work, is not a contract for repairs within the meaning of a statute requiring contracts for repairs to be let to the lowest bidder.

A public-improvement ordinance is an exercise of the taxing power, and the authority granted by it is not subject to the control of the courts.

Brace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover the amount of a special tax bill assessed by the proper authorities of the city of St. Louis against the property of defendants abutting on Jefferson avenue, in favor of the plaintiff, for work done in reconstructing and paving said avenue. Upon a trial in the circuit court judgment was rendered for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed to this court. Upon a motion to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction the case was transferred to the St. Louis court of appeals (138 Mo. 228, 39 S. W. 781) where the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, in pursuance of the opinion of a majority of that court (76 Mo. App. 135), delivered on the 21st of June, 1893. Biggs, J., sitting therein (148 Mo. 675, 43 L. R. A. 845, 50 S. W. 293) dissenting, and, in his dissenting opinion, deeming the decision rendered therein contrary to the previous decision of this court in Verdin v. St. Louis, 131 Mo. 26, 33 S. W. 480, 36 S. W. 52. The case was certified here for final determination.

This is one of several suits pending on like tax bills. The litigation in regard to these tax bills was commenced in the St. Louis city circuit court, by the Verdin Case, in July, 1893. That case was a proceeding in equity against the city of St. Louis, the Board of Public Improvements, and the plaintiff in this case, to restrain the issuance and collection of these tax bills. The case went off in the circuit court upon a demurrer by the city to the bill, which was sustained by the circuit court, and the plaintiff appealed from the judgment on the demurrer, to this court, where the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, and upon the dismissal thereof in that court, suits were instituted upon the tax bills. The Verdin Case was decided at the October term, 1895. The opinion of the majority of the court was delivered by Burgess, J., who in the third paragraph thereof said:

"3. It is contended that § 542 of the revised ordinances of the city is repugnant to the letter and spirit of the provisions of the charter of the city of St. Louis, and therefore null and void and of no effect, and that the action of the city in letting the contract for reconstruction and maintenance, together, is obnoxious and unlawful. Said section is as follows:

"Sec. 542. Whenever a street is to be improved, either on the motion of the board of public improvements or on petition of the adjoining property owners, the board of public improvements may submit to the municipal assembly a bill for letting in one contract the work of constructing or reconstructing such street, and of maintaining it in good condition for a term of years; and after such bill has become a law the board of public improvements shall advertise for proposals, including the construction or reconstruction and maintenance under the same regulations as are provided for the improvement of streets; but the advertisement shall, in addition to what is prescribed for other street improvements, state the term during which the street is to be maintained in good condition, and the amount of bond which the contractor will be required to furnish to secure the execution of the contract for maintenance, in addition to the bond which under existing regulations has to be furnished for all contracts for street improvements. The letting of the work, the awarding of the contract, and the approval of the contract and of the bonds shall be carried out as now provided for other street improvements. In canvassing the proposals, the lowest bid shall be ascertained by taking the aggregate amount of the cost of construction or reconstruction as the case may be, and the total cost of maintenance, for the term of years designated by the ordinance. The special tax bills against the adjoining property for the work of construction or reconstruction shall be issued whenever the work has been completed and accepted. The contract shall provide that the obligation of the contractor to maintain the streets in good condition shall commence one year after the completion and acceptance of the work of construction or reconstruction, and the contract price shall be paid semiannually out of the city treasury, on the certificate of the street commissioner that the work has been performed in accordance with the contract and specifications. The bond to be given to insure the maintenance of streets during the term agreed upon shall be $15 for every square (of one hundred superficial feet) of the street embraced in the contract. The contract shall provide that the contractor shall, whenever notified by the street commissioner that any repairs are required, at once make such repairs at his own expense, and if they are not made within proper time the street commissioner shall have power to cause such repairs to be made, and the cost thereof shall be paid out of the fund provided for the payment of contracts for street maintenance, and the amount shall be deducted from any money then due under the contract, or which may thereafter become due. And it shall further provide, that if at any time during the term for which the contract for the maintenance of the streets is in force the pavement of such street or any part thereof has deteriorated to such an extent as to require in the opinion of the board of public improvements, reconstruction, the street commissioner may, with the approval of the board of public improvements and of the mayor, notify the contractor that reconstruction is necessary, and that the contractor shall, within three months after receiving such notice, reconstruct the whole or such part of the pavement with the same kind of material as heretofore applied, or with some other material approved by the board of public improvements. And the contract shall also provide that if the contractor fails to reconstruct the street within three months after having been notified, the board of public improvements may, with the approval of the mayor, cancel the contract and relet the work of reconstructing the pavement, and that the cost of such reconstruction shall be paid by the city and the amount collected by suit from the contractor or his sureties, not to exceed $15 per square of pavement, included in the contract. And the contract shall provide that whenever any repairs of the street are made necessary from the construction of sewers, the laying of pipes or telegraph wires or from any other disturbance of the pavement by parties acting under permits issued by the city, the contractor for the maintenance of the street shall, on notification from the street commissioner, immediately make all necessary repairs in conformity with the specification for this class of work. The cost of all such repairs, exclusive of trenching and back-filling, which shall be done by the parties who hold the permits and in a manner as now required by existing ordinances, shall be paid for at the full contract price for a superficial square of new pavement out of the fund set apart for the payment of contracts for the maintenance of streets, and the amount shall be certified by the street commissioner to the auditor, who shall reimburse, by transfer, the aforesaid fund from the funds of the proper department, if the repairs were made necessary by the construction of any public improvement; and out of the funds to be deposited by persons obtaining permits for opening streets before such permits are granted, if the repairs are made necessary by work done under such permits. And the contract shall further provide that the contractor for the maintenance of such streets shall have the right to make all repairs which become necessary by the construction of any public improvement, or by the work done by private parties under permits given by the city.

"It is argued that the maintenance of Jefferson avenue for nine years amounts to nothing more than 'repairs' on the street for nine years, within the meaning of § 27, art. 6, of the city charter; that it involves expenditures for labor and material, and is public work, within the meaning of the section; that it is a separate matter from reconstruction, and should have been let to contract separately and independently thereof; that ordinance 17,151, for the maintenance and reconstruction of Jefferson avenue, is null and void, because, as an ordinance for maintenance—being for the public work for the repair of Jefferson avenue for nine years—it should specify the material to be used in such repairs, and an estimate of the cost of maintenance, as required by § 15, art. 6, of the charter.

"By said § 27, art. 6, it is provided that any public work, or repairs thereof, and to fix the price or rate therefor, shall be let out by the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, subject to the approval of the council, 48 L. R. A.

and any other mode of letting out work shall be null and void. Does the maintenance of Jefferson avenue for nine years, within the meaning of said section, mean, or amount to, repairs?

"It must be conceded that such work amounts to the expenditure of labor and money, and that it has no direct connection with the work of reconstruction. While it is the duty of the board of public improvements, in all cases, except in case of necessary repairs requiring prompt attention, to prepare and submit to the assembly estimates of costs of any proposed work, and, under the direction of the ordinance, advertise for bids, and to let out such work by contract to the lowest responsible bidder, subject to the approval of the council, no such thing was ever done in this case. The costs and expenses attending the maintenance of streets are paid by the city out of the funds set apart annually for street repairs—reconstruction of streets. Sec. 6, Ord. 17,151. The costs of repairs of all streets and highways, and cleaning the same, are also paid out of the general fund of the city. § 18, art. 6, supra.

"The word 'maintain' does not mean to provide or construct, but means to keep up; to keep from change; to preserve (Worcester Dict.); to hold or keep in any particular state or condition; to keep up (Webster Dict.).

"In Moon v. Durden, 2 Exch. 21, it was said: 'The verb to "maintain" . . . signified to support what has already been brought into existence.' See also Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Godman, 104 Ind. 490, 4 N. E. 163.

"'To repair' means to restore to a sound or good state after decay, injury, dilapidation or partial destruction. (Webster Dict.)' Gulf City Street R. & Real Estate Co. v. Galveston, 69 Tex. loc. cit., 660, 663, 7 S.W. 520. See also Pittsburg & B. Pass. R. Co. v. Pittsburg, 80 Pa. loc. cit., 76.

"It will thus be seen that 'maintenance' and 'repair' when applied to a street practically mean one and the same thing. Maintenance, being a separate and distinct public work, must be contracted for like any other public work. The material with which it is to be done must be specified by the board, and an estimate of the cost should be sent to the municipal assembly, together with an ordinance recommending such repairs. Nothing of that kind was done in this case, but the bid for reconstruction and maintenance were both let together, at the same time and to the same party, with no estimate as to the cost of the latter, which could only be made, under the charter, after the repairs became necessary. There was no legal obstacle in the way to one person becoming the contractor for both the reconstruction and maintenance, if under the city charter and ordinance the contract could be let to the lowest bidder; but in any event as the costs of reconstruction are assessed against the property holders, while the costs of maintenance are paid by the city, the lettings must necessarily have been separate and upon different estimates.

"The board of public improvements of the defendant city had, previous to the time of letting the contract for reconstruction and maintenance to the Barber Asphalt Paving Company, publicly announced as a rule for the conduct of said board that no bid for maintenance which should exceed 50 cents per square would be considered or recommended, which was estimated to be about cost, or less than cost, and by letting the contract maintenance and reconstruction together the bidder was enabled to make a bid for such maintenance at about cost, and thereby protect himself against any possible loss on account of his contract for maintenance by bidding a higher price for reconstruction.

"Under § 18, art. 6, supra, the paving, curbing, guttering, sidewalks, and the materials for the roadways, the repairs of alleys and sidewalks, are charged upon the adjoining property as a special tax, while the cost of their maintenance is paid by the city, and there is no apparent reason why this work could not be done as well by one contractor as another. But by letting to the defendant, the Barber Asphalt Paving Company, the contract for reconstruction, and at the same time, and as part of the same contract, the contract for the maintenance of Jefferson avenue for the period of nine years at the price of $1,962, the contractor was enabled to obtain from the property holders, in advance, payment in whole or in part for the maintenance which, under the charter, is required to be paid by the city; and if, after the work of reconstruction is completed, the property holders refuse to pay at once, a special tax bill is immediately issued, which is a lien upon the property for the cost of the work of maintenance, which has not been done, and which the contractor may never do.

"People ex rel. Hall v. Maher, 56 Hun, 81, 9 N. Y. Supp. 94, was upon objections filed to the letting of a contract to the National Vulcanite Company for grading and paving a street in the city of Albany, New York, with Trinidad sheet asphalt. The contract was objected to because of the fact that it contained a provision which required the contractor to keep in repair the pavement, laid in pursuance of the provision thereof, for the period of seven years, from and after the acceptance by the city, without expense to said city or to the abutting property owners. It was held (we quote from the syllabi), 'that the necessary effect of this contract was to charge upon the property owners the cost of keeping the avenue in repair for seven years, in violation of the provision of the act of the legislature which charged such expense upon the city at large. That anything in the contract which imposed upon the property owners more than the obligation of having the pavement well constructed in the outset, was unjust to them.'

"In the case in hand, by letting the reconstruction, and maintenance of the street together, plaintiffs were compelled to pay part of the expense of maintenance, which by law they were only responsible, if at all, for the expense of reconstruction.

"Moreover, ordinance number 17,151 provides for the reconstruction of Jefferson avenue, by taking up and removing the old pavement of the roadway, preparing the roadbed, renewing and readjusting the curbing, laying a roadway pavement of best quality of Trinidad Lake asphalt on a concrete base, except between the rails of the street railway occupying the street, which last-mentioned space was to be paved with granite blocks, laid on a bed of sand, the curbing to be of limestone; while ordinance No. 542 provides for the letting of such work all in one contract, which is in direct conflict with § 27, supra, of the charter, which provides for the letting of such contracts to the lowest bidder, as provided for purchases by the commissioner of supplies, while by § 29, art. 4, of the charter it is provided that, 'in advertising for proposals to furnish supplies, quantity and quality of all articles shall be fully stated, and any bidder may bid for any one article named.'

"The notice of the letting of the contract said nothing as to the different kinds of work to be done, or materials to be furnished in reconstruction, although estimates for such work and materials were properly made, but simply gave notice that the board of public improvements would hold a special meeting at a time fixed, at its office in the city hall, for the purpose of considering the matter of reconstructing with asphaltum Jefferson avenue and other streets. As to work and material, other than asphaltum, there was no notice at all, and even if there had been no one could have bid on any part or parcel thereof, because of the fact that the ordinance provides for the reconstruction with Trinidad Lake asphalt, a monopolized article, in one contract, which not only prevented competition in bidding as to that part of the contract, but for any other work or materials also.

"No part of the cost of maintenance of the street could be imposed upon the plaintiffs, in the absence of express authority under the charter to do so. We, therefore, conclude that § 542 of the revised ordinances of the defendant city is in conflict with, and contrary to, the meaning and spirit of the city charter, and null and void.

"Nor do we think the fact that the contractor is required to give bond for the maintenance of the streets legalizes the contract. Here the contract for reconstructing the street and the maintenance of it after construction were entirely different matters, having no immediate or necessary connection whatever with each other.

"Moreover, ordinance 17,161, which provides for the reconstruction of Jefferson avenue, being for public work, should have specified the material to be used in such maintenance as required by § 15, art. 6, of the charter, and, as it failed to do so, is also null and void."

Gantt and Macfarlane, JJ., concurred in so much of that paragraph "as holds the ordinances in question in requiring contracts for reconstruction and maintenance to be let in one contract as stated in the petition, to be in violation of the charter of the city and void," and in the result, as did Barclay, J., who, in a separate opinion said:

"2. The scheme of procedure adopted by the board of public improvements under ordinance 542 (Rev. Ord. St. Louis, 1887) in respect of reconstruction and maintenance of the proposed street is illegal, because the plain effect and obvious intent of the scheme are to put upon the owner of the real property (properly chargeable by special tax with the cost of reconstruction) a portion of the expense of repairs of the improved street for a long term of years. The latter expense the city is bound by the charter to bear, and cannot shuffle off upon the adjacent property in the mode attempted by the scheme referred to, as described in the petition in this suit.

"3. 'Maintenance' is a word whose meaning is greatly influenced by its context. As used in the ordinance (542) before the court, it appears to me to include the idea of putting on the repairs needed to maintain the street in its completed condition. The city cannot lawfully cast upon the adjacent property (under the guise of reconstruction) a part of the burden of repairs, which the charter requires the city to bear. By calling that burden 'maintenance' the nature of the work is not changed, nor is the liability of the property owner under the charter enlarged.

"4. The two charges for reconstruction and maintenance have been so blended (by the scheme of special taxation adopted in the case before the court) that the valid charge for reconstruction cannot be definitely ascertained, and severed from the invalid charge for repairs sought to be thrown upon the adjacent property. Some part of the expense properly chargeable to the city for repairs is embodied in the special tax laid upon plaintiff's property for alleged reconstruction of the street. That is the effect (and obviously the intended effect) of the scheme originating in ordinance 542, as worked out by the board of public improvements, according to the account given of it by the petition. Hence the assessment for reconstruction (as now made) cannot be enforced, containing, as it does, an unascertained and uncertain illegal element."

From the opinion of the majority and their decision, Sherwood and Robinson, JJ., and Brace, Ch. J., dissented, their reasons for such dissent being expressed in an exhaustive opinion by Sherwood, J., 131 Mo. 103 et seq. 33 S. W. 480, 36 S. W. 52.

Afterwards at the October term, 1896, the case of Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Ullman, 137 Mo. 543, 38 S. W. 458, was decided, the plaintiff in that suit and in the one in hand being the same. That suit was an action upon a special tax bill, issued in regular form by the authorities of the city of St. Joseph, in favor of the plaintiff against an abutting property owner, for the improvement of one of its streets under a contract made in pursuance of an ordinance in which the plaintiff guaranteed the pavement for five years, and agreed "to keep the same in repair during the period of said guaranty," and although the charter required that "the cost of repairing and keeping in repair the paving and macadamizing of all streets and avenues shall be paid out of the general revenue of the city," the contract was sustained and the tax bill upheld. The opinion in that case was written by Barclay, J., and concurred in by Sherwood, Macfarlane, and Robinson, JJ., and by Brace, Ch. J.

In the opinion, the learned judge distinguished the case from the Verdin Case, but as Gantt and Burgess, JJ., could not "perceive the distinction," in principle, they dissented and expressed their views in a dissenting opinion written by Gantt, J., 137 Mo. 572 et seq. 38 S. W. 458.

In the meantime one of the suits upon the St. Louis tax bill having been tried, and judgment thereon rendered in the circuit court in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff appealed to the St. Louis court of appeals, where the judgment of the circuit court was at first affirmed on the authority of the Verdin Case, but afterwards on motion for rehearing was certified to this court on account of a supposed conflict between the decision in that case, and the later decision in the Ullman Case. In due course, the case came on for hearing in this court, and was decided at the October term, 1898. Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Woesten, 147 Mo. 467, ante, 279, 48 S. W. 939. The tax bill upon which that suit was brought was issued under an ordinance drawn in the same language, and under a contract let under the same circumstances and conditions as the tax bill sued on in this case; about the only difference between the two cases being in the names and amounts; and that the Seaboard tax bill was for paving on Grand avenue, and the Hazel tax bill for paving on Jefferson avenue. The opinion in the Seaboard Case was written by Macfarlane, J., and after mature consideration was concurred in by Sherwood, Robinson, Brace, and Williams, JJ., and dissented from by Gantt, Ch. J., and Burgess, J. In the opinion, the Verdin and Ullman Cases were reviewed, and the Seaboard Case distinguished from them. Whatever may be thought of these distinctions, the conclusions therein reached, and the reasoning upon which it rests, meet with our approval. And as the case in hand cannot be distinguished from that case, but is on all fours with it, presenting the same facts for judgment that passed into judgment under the opinion in that case, and as the argument on the question has been exhausted in that and the foregoing cases, we are content to sustain the contract and uphold the tax bill herein, upon the authority of that case; holding in this, as in that, case, that the ordinance and contract were not in violation of any of the provisions of the city charter, and that the special tax bill sued on is a legal charge against the property of the defendant.

It follows that the judgment of the Cir-ent Court should be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court with directions to enter up judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. It is accordingly so ordered.

Robinson, Sherwood, Marshall and Valliant, JJ., concur; Gantt, Ch. J., and Burgess, J., dissent.

v.

City of ST. LOUIS et al., Respts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A city cannot be held liable for the drowning of children in a pond which is situated partly upon a street and partly upon private premises, on the ground that the pond is a nuisance which the city has failed to abate, where it does not appear that the accident happened upon that portion of the pond which is located upon the street.

The drowning of children in a pond while skating on the ice formed upon it does not render the owner of the land liable in the absence of anything to show that the children were there by permission or invitation.

(November 14, 1899.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for the drowning of plaintiff's children which was alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. J. Rowe, for appellants:

Unguarded premises supplied with dangerous attractions are regarded as holding out an implied invitation to children, which will make the owner of the premises liable for injuries to them, even though they be technical trespassers. Whether or not the dangerous premises were so attractive to children as to suggest the probability of the accident, and thus render the owner liable, is a question for the jury.

The owner of property abutting on a public highway is bound to keep his premises in a condition reasonably safe for the public who have occasion to travel on the highway.

The city is bound to keep its streets in a condition safe for the public to travel thereon.

NOTE.—As to liability for dangerous condition of premises lying open beside a highway or frequented path, see note to Lepnick v. Gaddis (Miss.) 26 L. R. A. 686, and the subsequent cases of Pekin v. McMahon (Ill.) 27 L. R. A. 48 L. R. A.

Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65, 9 N. E. 155.

Messrs. B. Schnurmacher and Charles Claffin Allen, for respondent city of St. Louis:

Municipal corporations are not required to keep all of their streets in good repair, but only such as are necessary for the use of the traveling public, and which have been actually opened for travel.

Bassett v. St. Joseph, 53 Mo. 290, 14 Am. Rep. 446; Brennan v. St. Louis, 92 Mo. 482, 2 S. W. 481.

And they are then only "bound to keep the streets and highways in a proper state of repair, free from obstructions, so that they will be reasonably safe for travel."

Smith v. St. Joseph, 45 Mo. 449.

Those not using the streets for purposes of travel cannot complain of their condition. The liability of the corporation extends only to travelers injured therein.

A city is not bound to guard its streets or bridges so as to prevent children from playing thereon and exposing themselves to danger, and is not liable for injuries which may be thus received.

The existence of the pond was not the proximate cause of the accident, and therefore the city is not liable.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1007; Butz v. Cavanaugh, 137 Mo. 503, 38 S. W. 1104.

If it occurred on the Dawson property the city was not liable, because a municipal corporation is not liable for its failure to abate a nuisance on private property.

Mr. L. Frank Ottofy, for respondent Dawson:

The owner of real estate is not liable in damages to a trespasser who falls into an excavation thereon, but only to one lawfully passing along the street who is accidentally injured while lawfully using the public highway as a traveler.

The allegation of the petition that at the time of the accident "the ice on said pond was so thin that it was dangerous to go thereon" is sufficient to sustain the demurrer. This was the proximate cause of the accident, and it is held, regardless of other considerations, that children thirteen and fourteen years of age are guilty of contributory negligence under such circumstances.

Butz v. Cavanaugh, 137 Mo. 503, 38 S. W. 1104.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by plaintiffs, who were, at the time of the injury complained of, husband and wife, and as such prosecute this suit to recover from defendants, the city of St. Louis and Isabella Dawson, the sum of $10,000 damages for the death of their two minor children, Arthur James Arnold and Amanda Mary Arnold, who were drowned in the city of St. Louis on the 12th day of January, 1897, while skating upon the ice which had formed upon a pond of water which it is alleged had formed upon a portion of Taylor avenue, one of the public streets of said city, between Margaretta and Kossuth avenues, and upon land of the defendant Isabella Dawson, abutting the west side of said Taylor avenue. The petition is in two counts. The first is to recover $5,000 on account of the death of the boy, and the second is to recover the same amount on account of the death of the girl. This is the only material difference between the two counts. They both aver that the children were minors and unmarried; that the city of St. Louis is and was a municipal corporation; that Taylor avenue, between Margaretta and Kossuth avenues, is a public highway, and that defendant Isabella Dawson at the times mentioned in the petition was the owner of certain real estate fronting on the west side of Taylor avenue between the streets mentioned; that on January 12, 1897, and for a long time prior thereto, the defendants carelessly, negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully suffered and permitted a large body of water, 200 feet long, 100 feet wide, and 20 feet deep, to collect and remain on the above portion of Taylor avenue and on the real estate of defendant Dawson; that said body of water had collected and remained on said street and said premises for more than a year prior to January 12, 1897, which fact was well known to the defendant city, and that it was the duty of said defendant to so guard said body of water that it would not be dangerous to the public. The petition further alleges that the water so collected was in the vicinity of the Ashland School (one of the public schools of the city of St. Louis), and that when frozen over it was attractive to children of tender years, and to the deceased children of plaintiffs, who were drawn there for the purpose of skating upon the ice; that, upon the day just named, ice had formed upon the pond, attracting children from said school, and other children, to skate thereon; "and that the ice on said pond was so thin that it was dangerous to go thereon." The petition proceeds to allege that on January 12, 1897, the children of plaintiffs, attracted as aforesaid, went upon the pond to skate, and the ice broke, and that they were immediately drowned. It is also averred in each of said counts that the fact that a large number of children were in the habit of skating upon said ice was well known to defendants, and that the death of the children was caused "by the carelessness and the negligence and wrongful action of the defendants in wrongfully suffering and permitting said pond to form on said Taylor avenue and said real estate above and heretofore described herein, and to remain thereon unguarded, so that when it was frozen over it would attract children to skate thereon." To this petition each of the defendants filed a general demurrer on the ground that the same does not contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which demurrers were sustained by the court. Plaintiffs declining to plead further, final judgment was entered in favor of defendants on the demurrers, and plaintiffs brought the case to this court by appeal.

The petition shows very conclusively that the action is not based upon the ground that Arthur James Arnold and Amanda Mary Arnold were travelers upon the street of defendant city, and that by reason of its unsafe condition it was dangerous to persons passing along and upon it, in consequence of which they were drowned, but upon the ground that the pond, when covered with ice, was attractive to children; so that, as deceased were not using the street at the time of the accident for the purpose of travel, the rule of law which requires municipalities to keep their streets in a reasonably safe condition for that purpose does not govern in this case, for the city owed them no such duty. Smith v. St. Joseph, 45 Mo. 449; Bassett v. St. Joseph, 53 Mo. 290, 14 Am. Rep. 446; Russell v. Columbia, 74 Mo. 480, 41 Am. Rep. 325; Kiley v. Kansas, 87 Mo. 103, 56 Am. Rep. 443; Brennan v. St. Louis, 92 Mo. 482, 2 S. W. 481. At Taylor avenue, where the accident occurred, it seems that the water covered the street to the depth of 20 feet, and that the children went upon the ice which had accumulated over it on the pond, and were skating thereon, in consequence of which they were drowned; so that, unless the city was negligent in permitting the pond to remain in its uninclosed or unguarded condition, it cannot be held to respond in damages in consequence of the death of the children. In the case of Schauf v. Paducah, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1798, 50 S. W. 42, there was a pond in the commons of the city, some distance from any highway; and while plaintiff's son, about seven years of age, was crossing the commons, he caught a bird, and, seeing some children fishing at the pond, he went over to where they were. The bird got away from him and fluttered out into the water, and he waded out after it, and in doing so ventured too far, and got over his depth and was drowned. It was ruled that the city was not liable. The court said: "Accumulations of water are common about all cities, especially river towns. A large part of the farm houses of this state have ponds about them. The city was under the same obligation as any other lot owner, and no more. The child did not lose his life from the dangerous proximity of the pond to a highway, or from any secret danger, such as a great depth of water near the bank, but from his voluntarily wading out in the pond some 10 feet after the bird. It was not the duty of the city to provide against such a contingency as this. In Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365, a boy eight years old, while fishing in a well in an old brickyard, fell in it and was drowned,—a stronger case for the plaintiff than we have here,—yet it was held that there could be no recovery. The court said: 'We are unable to see anything in this case to charge the defendants with negligence in not inclosing their lot or guarding the well. There was no concealed trap or deadfall, as in Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332. The well was open and visible to the eye. No one was likely to walk into it by day, and this accident did not occur at night. A boy playing upon its edge might fall in, just as he might in any pond or stream of water. In this respect the well was no more dangerous than the river front on both sides of the city, where boys of all ages congregate in large numbers for fishing and other amusements. Vacant brickyards and open lots exist on all sides of the city. There are streams and pools of water where children may be drowned; there are inequalities of surface where they may be injured. To compel the owners of such property either to inclose it or fill up their ponds, and leave the surface so that trespassers may not be injured, would be an oppressive rule. The law does not require us to enforce any such principle, even where the trespassers are children. We all know that boys of eight years of age indulge in athletic sports. They fish, shoot, swim, and climb trees. All of these amusements are attended with danger, and accidents frequently occur. It is part of a boy's nature to trespass, especially where there is tempting fruit; yet I never heard that it was the duty of the owner of a fruit tree to cut it down because a boy trespasser may fall from its branches. Yet the principle contended for by plaintiff would bring us to this absurdity, if carried to its logical conclusion. Moreover, it would charge the duty of protection of children upon every member of the community except their parents.' " In Dehanitz v. St. Paul, 73 Minn. 385, 76 N. W. 48, there was within the city of St. Paul a slough, which during high water in the Mississippi river filled with water, and had no outlet. The streets in this part of the city were dedicated to the public, but never by the city opened, kept, or used, although the tract was an open common. In this slough was an open basin, 60 to 75 feet across, which was contiguous to James street. For a long time the city had used this hollow basin as a place for dumping garbage and manure, which during high water floats upon the water, and forms a crust, upon which grows vegetation similar to that upon surrounding land. The plaintiff's intestate, a girl ten years old, left James street, upon which she had been traveling, and, either for convenience or pleasure, attempted to cross over this crust on her way to a packing house, one fourth of a mile distant, when the crust broke, and she fell into the water and was drowned. It was not alleged in the petition that the public had ever traveled over this dumping ground, or used it as an open common. It was held, on demurrer to the petition, that the city owed no duty of protection or warning in respect to the girl going upon this dumping ground or crust as a traveler, and hence was not liable in damages for her death.

The principle announced in these cases seems to be decisive of the case in hand, for although the petition avers that Taylor avenue, between Margaretta and Kossuth avenues, is a public highway, which implies that it was open to the use of the public, the subsequent allegation that it was covered with water 20 feet deep shows that it was impossible that it could have been used for such a purpose. The act of the children in venturing upon the ice was entirely voluntary upon their part, and is wholly unlike that class of cases where a person is traveling with proper care upon a sidewalk in a city, and by reason of its defective condition, or its close proximity to some hole or dangerous place, falls and is injured; for in such case the city will be held to respond in damages for the injury, upon the ground that as to such persons it is bound to keep its sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition for pedestrians both by day and by night, while, as to persons not using its sidewalks for the purposes for which they are intended (for instance, skating upon ice formed thereon on a pond 20 feet deep), it owes no such duty. Plaintiffs, however, rely upon Lepnick v. Gaddis, 72 Miss. 200, 26 L. R. A. 686, 16 So. 213, as supporting their contention. In that case Gaddis owned a lot at the intersection of two streets. A storehouse which stood thereon was burned down some years before the accident, leaving an uncovered cistern on the vacant lot. It was alleged in the petition that by the invitation and by the license of the defendant the public, in passing from street to street, crossed over his lot by two commonly traveled paths, which became well defined, and each of which ran near by the cistern. It was also alleged "that, during the winter of 1893, appellant, a stranger, while carefully using the highway (the night being dark, rainy, and cloudy, and there being nothing to show where the highway ended and the vacant lot began), strayed therefrom, and, whilst so bewildered and lost, fell into said cistern and was injured." Held, upon demurrer to the petition, that it stated a good cause of action. It will be obvious that there is a very material difference between the facts in that case and in the one in hand, in this: In that case the injured party did not knowingly and voluntarily enter a place of danger, while in the case in hand they did. Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 9 N. E. 155, is another case relied upon by plaintiffs. In that case the defendant city, while constructing a bridge, made an excavation in the bed of a shallow stream, where it was crossed by a street, and constructed a levee from the bank to the excavation, and, knowing that the children of persons residing near were accustomed to play in the vicinity, left it, in the absence of workmen, without safeguards of any kind, by reason of which a child — years of age, while at play, without any fault on the part of its parents, fell into the excavation and was drowned. It was held that the city was liable. But that case, it will be seen, was bottomed upon the negligent act of the city in digging a hole in the street, in which water accumulated, and into which plaintiff's child fell and was drowned. Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L. R. A. 206, 39 N. E. 484, is another case relied upon by plaintiffs. That was an action against the city as the owner of land next to one of its streets, upon which land there was a deep hole or pit, in which water had accumulated, and upon which floated logs and planks, which was alleged to be a source of attraction to children in the locality, who resorted there to play. Plaintiff's child, eight years of age, while so engaged was drowned; and it was held that plaintiff might recover. But that case is not in line with the rulings of this court in Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 424, 6 S. W. 74; Witte v. Stifel, 126 Mo. 303, 28 S. W. 891; and Butz v. Cavanaugh, 137 Mo. 503, 38 S. W. 1104. In the case last cited it was held that the owner of land was not responsible for injuries sustained by a boy twelve years of age who voluntarily went into an excavation on private property near a street, and burned his feet in a smouldering fire therein.

The petition does not allege that the accident happened in that portion of the pond which is located in the street; which was absolutely necessary in order to hold the city upon the ground that the pond was a nuisance; and, if the accident happened upon that portion of the pond located upon the land of Isabella Dawson, the city cannot be held liable for an injury occurring upon the land of another, upon the ground that the place where it occurs is a nuisance, and that the city had failed to abate it. Moran v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 134 Mo. 641, 33 L. R. A. 755, 36 S. W. 659; Harman v. St. Louis, 137 Mo. 494, 38 S. W. 1102.

As to the defendant Isabella Dawson, if the children were drowned upon that part of the pond which is upon her land, there is nothing in the petition which tends to show that they were there by her permission or invitation, in the absence of which it must be inferred that they were trespassers, and their representatives without remedy against her. Witte v. Stifel, 126 Mo. 303, 28 S. W. 891; Moran v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 134 Mo. 641, 33 L. R. A. 755, 36 S. W. 659; Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 424, 6 S. W. 74; Butz v. Cavanaugh, 137 Mo. 503, 38 S. W. 1104.

For these considerations, we affirm the judgment.

COUNTY OF SCOTTS BLUFF.

(.....Neb.....)

*A contract by which a person agrees to draft a bill, have it introduced in a legislature, explain it to, and make arguments in its favor before, committees of the legislature, and do all things needful and proper to secure its passage, such party to receive no compensation unless the passage of the bill (an appropriation act) is procured. If successful the fees not fixed, but to be liberal, is vicious, illegal, and void, and, in the event of the passage of the bill, there can be no recovery of a fee in a suit upon the contract, nor as upon an implied contract, nor a quantum meruit for the services performed.

ERROR to the District Court for Scotts Bluff County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in a suit brought to recover compensation for services rendered in procuring from the legislature an appropriation to meet the expenses of a criminal trial. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. B. Reese, O. A. Robbins, and F. L. Foss, for plaintiff in error:

The services rendered by the plaintiff for the defendant before the legislature in securing the passage of the bill for the relief of the defendant were lawful services.

Foltz v. Cogswell, 86 Cal. 542, 25 Pac. 60; Kansas P. R. Co. v. McCoy, 8 Kan. 533; Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. S. 548, 23 L. ed. 983.

If the contract was legal it would not be made illegal by misconduct on the part of the plaintiff in carrying it out.

Barry v. Capen, 151 Mass. 99, 6 L. R. A. 308, 23 N. E. 735.

There is no taint of illegality in the contract set forth in the petition in this case, and no evidence of the use of improper or unlawful means in its performance by the plaintiff. Illegality is not specially pleaded in the answer, and the question of its existence cannot arise under the issues framed and tried.

Messrs. M. J. Huffman, T. M. Morrow, and George W. Helst, for defendant in error:

Lebeher v. Custer County Comrs. 9 Mont. 315, 23 Pac. 713.

The knowledge of two members of the board of county commissioners that plaintiff was expecting remuneration for her services is not sufficient to show that the board of county commissioners had knowledge that the plaintiff was working in the interests of the county before the legislature, and was expecting remuneration for said work.

Stoner v. Keith County, 48 Neb. 279, 67 N. W. 311; Pouke v. Jackson County, 84 Iowa, 616, 52 N. W. 71.

The alleged contract upon which plaintiff seeks to recover as set up in her petition and explained in the evidence introduced by her in support of her claim for work performed thereunder is clearly void as against public policy.

Harrison, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was filed in this action in the district court of Scotts Bluff county a petition which was in part as follows: "The plaintiff complains of the defendant, and alleges that on or before the 1st day of January, 1893, the plaintiff was a duly-authorized attorney at law, and admitted to practice in the courts of the state of Nebraska, and as such attorney at law was engaged in the practice of her profession in accepting retainers, and prosecuting and defending such claims and cases as came within her employment as such attorney at law. That prior to said date and time, to wit, on or about the 1st day of September, 1889, a criminal action was tried in said county of Scotts Bluff, wherein the state of Nebraska prosecuted George S. Arnold for the crime of murder in the first degree, and such proceedings were had therein as resulted in a conviction of said Arnold. That the whole costs of said prosecution and trial amounted to about the sum of $7,016.01. That at said time the said county of Scotts Bluff had but recently been organized, and, being compelled to pay said costs, the same became a heavy burden upon the people and taxpayers of said county, and the said county determined to make an attempt to obtain back the said expenses from the state by means of an appropriation by the legislature, and to do all things necessary or available to that result. Accordingly, thereupon, about the 14th day of January, 1893, two of the county commissioners of said Scotts Bluff county, being a majority of all the county commissioners of said Scotts Bluff county, for and on behalf of said county, orally employed this plaintiff to prepare a suitable appropriation bill, appropriating and paying to the said county sufficient funds from the treasury of the state of Nebraska to reimburse the said Scotts Bluff county the money so paid out and expended by the said county, and to argue the merits of said bill before the proper legislative committees, and to do all things needful and proper to procure the passage thereof and the money sought, and agreed to pay plaintiff, on condition of success, a very liberal fee and compensation for said services; all of which plaintiff agreed to do. Thereupon, at the instance and request of a majority of the county commissioners of said county of Scotts Bluff, acting for and on behalf of said county, and in pursuance of the said agreement of employment, on or about the said 16th day of January, 1893, this plaintiff entered upon said employment, and went to the city of Lincoln, the capital of said state, where and when the legislature of the state of Nebraska was in session, and, under and by virtue of said employment, prepared and drafted said appropriation bill, and appeared before the proper committees of the senate and house of representatives, and the various members of said bodies, in public, and, as attorney and agent of said county, presented to said committees and members the merits, legality, and justice of said bill, and procured and caused the said bill to be passed, appropriating to said Scotts Bluff county for said purpose the sum of $7,495.73, and which bill, known as 'House Roll 278,' became a law of said state April 6, 1893, and the said sum of money was duly appropriated to and for the use and benefit of said Scotts Bluff county. That at all times the said Scotts Bluff county, and the officers thereof, had full knowledge and notice of the services of plaintiff, and of her claim to remuneration therefor, and, so knowing of her said services and claim under the said contract, received and accepted the money so appropriated by said legislature to the said county. That the board of county commissioners of Scotts Bluff county, with the full knowledge of the said services of plaintiff, and that by means thereof the said appropriation was made, and of her said claim to remuneration, in session accepted and received said money so appropriated by the state as aforesaid, and all the fruits of plaintiff's services in the premises, and thereby ratified the agreement of employment between the members of the board of county commissioners for and in behalf of said county and the plaintiff as aforesaid, and the request of said two members of the board to this plaintiff to perform said services. The said board of county commissioners in session as a board have, with full knowledge of the services of the plaintiff in the premises, and that the receipt of said money from the state as aforesaid was the fruit of plaintiff's services in the premises, without which the said money would not have been obtained by said county, appropriated and distributed to the use of said county all the said money received as aforesaid from the state. That in procuring the passage of said act and the appropriation of said money the plaintiff expended a large amount of time, to wit, about three months, and a large amount of money in the defraying of her expenses, and her services in connection therewith are of the value of $1,500 and more. That plaintiff complied with all the conditions of said contract of employment on her part to be performed, but defendant wholly failed to comply with the conditions thereof on its part, and has paid plaintiff nothing thereon. That the sum of $1,500 is justly due and owing to plaintiff from defendant, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from April 6, 1893."

In the answer there were admissions of the trial of the criminal case alleged in the petition, and that the costs were as stated in the petition; also that a bill or act for the "relief of Scotts Bluff county" had been prepared. It was pleaded that it was done by Hon. William Nevill, and was introduced by a member of the house of representatives, and, in the due course of legislation, became law, and by it there was appropriated to the purpose of the act the sum of $7,495.73, which was afterwards received by the county. It was further pleaded in the answer that: "Defendant, further answering, alleges that after the passage and approval of the said bill, as aforesaid, and before the said money had been paid by the state to the defendant, to wit, on the 20th day of June, 1893, the plaintiff herein filed a pretended attorney's lien with the auditor of public accounts of the state of Nebraska, claiming the sum of $1,500 as attorney's fees for prosecuting the passage of said bill through the legislature."

That the treasurer of the defendant, the county of Scotts Bluff, was thereby compelled, in order to obtain said money, to sue out of the supreme court of the state of Nebraska a peremptory writ of mandamus, at the cost of $369.62, to defendant, directing the auditor to pay the said sum of money over to defendant. That afterwards, on or about the 20th day of June, 1894, plaintiff filed a claim against the defendant with the board of county commissioners of the county of Scotts Bluff, which claim was wholly disallowed, for the reason that defendant was not and is not indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatever, from which disallowance this appeal is taken. (6) Defendant, further answering, denies that it ever, at any time or at any place, in any manner, by its board of county commissioners, or any part of said board, in session or out of session, or by any means whatever, acting for and on behalf of defendant, employed plaintiff, either orally or in writing, or any other way, to prepare said appropriation bill, and present and argue the same to and before any of the committees of either house of said legislature on behalf of said defendant, or any other purpose, and is not indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatever." The reply was a denial of the new matter in the answer. A trial was had to the court, a jury being waived, and the defendant was given judgment. The plaintiff has prosecuted error to this court.

Evidence was introduced for plaintiff, but none on part of defendant. The theory of the county in the trial court, gathered from the arguments in the brief filed, was, and is now, that there may have been some talk between the plaintiff and individuals of the county board with reference to a proposed application of the county to the state or the legislature for relief in the matter of the costs in the criminal case which was alluded to in the pleadings, but no negotiations or agreements with the board; that the plaintiff could not recover, for the reason that the contract asserted by plaintiff was illegal and void, and the services rendered were in lobbying for the passage of the bill, and no recovery could be had for them. For the plaintiff, it is argued, to the contrary, that the contract was made, and valid, and enforceable. If not properly made with the board, there was, in effect, a ratification by the board, and there was an acceptance of the services and fruits and benefits thereof, and the county must pay for the work done by plaintiff. The application to the legislature, as is disclosed by the petition, was not predicated upon matter of claim which had a legal basis. It was said in State ex rel. Sayre v. Moore, 40 Neb. 854, 25 L. R. A. 774, 59 N. W. 755, in regard to this appropriation, that it was "in the nature of a donation,"—"a gift, in fact." In regard to the services to be performed by the plaintiff, as we have seen, the petition stated she was to do all things needful and proper to procure the passage of the bill, and her fee was to be a liberal one, contingent, however, and dependent upon her procuring the passage of the bill. The plaintiff testified as follows:

Q. You are the plaintiff in this case?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You may commence at the beginning, and tell what took place between you and the commissioners with reference to obtaining an appropriation from the legislature, and tell what occurred between you and the commissioners.

A. In the spring or first of the year 1893, Elmer Morse, one of the board of commissioners,—chairman of the board of commissioners of Scotts Bluff county, I think he was,—spoke to me about going to Lincoln, and asked me if I thought I could procure the passage of a reimbursing bill. I told him I thought I could, but asked why Mr. Huffman, the county attorney, could not go. He said he thought Mr. Huffman—(Defendant objects to what was said about Mr. Huffman. Overruled. Exceptions.) He said he wished me to go because, Mr. Huffman said, he would have no influence with an independent legislature, while, if I wanted to go, he thought I could get a bill through the legislature. We talked about the matter of fee. He desired that if I went down that my expenses should all be paid, and said that, while he would hardly be willing to pay a fixed amount, I could have a very liberal percentage if I secured the passage of the bill. There was no amount agreed upon. The contract between him and myself was that I should have a very liberal fee.

Q. What if you did not obtain any appropriation?

A. I was not to receive anything. Mr. Decker agreed to the same thing.

One of the county commissioners testified as follows:

January, 1893, I made a verbal contract with the plaintiff, as an attorney and agent of Scotts Bluff county, Neb., to procure the passage of a bill by the legislature of Nebraska for the purpose of reimbursing Scotts Bluff county for the expense incurred in the trial of one George S. Arnold for the crime of murder. Said plaintiff was to prepare said bill, procure its introduction to the legislature, to argue the merits of said bill as agent and attorney of said Scotts Bluff county, Neb., and do whatever was necessary to secure the passage of said bill.

Q. For what compensation was the plaintiff in this case to carry out this contract on her behalf?

A. There was no specified sum mentioned. If the bill passed for only a part of the original sum sought, she was not to receive as much; but, in any event, she was to receive a very liberal fee in the event of success, which fee to be proportioned to the amount secured. The plaintiff was to pay all expenses, the county not to be held liable for any expense or compensation in the event that no amount sought in the bill was secured. On account of plaintiff taking the case conditionally, she was to receive a larger fee, in case she succeeded in securing the passage of the bill mentioned, than she would have received if Scotts Bluff county had guaranteed her expenses or a fee in any case.

A member of the senate, at the time the appropriation bill referred to herein was passed, testified as follows:

Do you know the amount of work and labor that Mrs. Richardson actually expended in the matter of procuring a favorable report from the committee on claims in the house, and also the same committee in the senate, and in procuring the passage of said bill through both branches of the legislature?

A. I know she was there when the session opened, and was there continuously, until after the bill was passed and approved by the governor and became a law, as far as was necessary for the legislature and its approval was concerned, which was very near the close of the session, and that she worked continuously for that bill. I know that she went to every member of the senate time and time again in working for the bill, and I also know that the sentiment of the senate was against the bill until turned the other way by her.

A party who was a member of the house when the bill passed stated, in testimony in this case:

I myself, with other members, was asked to listen to her narrative of the case and circumstances very early in the session,—I think the first week; and it continued until the passage of the bill, the date of which I don't remember, but it was very late in the session. She was constantly interviewing myself and other members of the house by urging us to look into the merits of the bill, and in advancing her arguments to show the merits of the case.

Q. State, if you remember, any of the difficulties and adverse report that had to be overcome to get the bill through.

A. Why, the committee on claims reported once—the first time that they reported—to allow one half of the claim. She fought the report after it came back to the house, and got it recommitted. The committee were not satisfied. The members of the committee expressed themselves dissatisfied with her refusal to take one half of the claim, and finally reported it back to be indefinitely postponed. She then came upon the floor, and mustered members enough to defeat it,—the report for indefinite postponement,—and had it ordered to the general file, and later she secured enough members to call it up out of its regular order, and considered it in open house, and finally secured the passage of the bill for the full amount asked.

Q. Speaking from your experience as a legislator, what would you say about the efficiency of her work and the legality of her means employed?

A. It was the shrewdest piece of work I ever saw done in the way of legislation, and the fact of her being a woman created a great deal of comment. She was the most persistent worker I ever saw, and the arguments she made, both before the committee and the members individually, were such as would have done credit to any attorney in the state.

In regard to contracts of the nature of the one which is herein asserted by plaintiff, it was stated in Wood v. McCann, 6 Dana, 366, quoted in Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 163, 164, and in an article by Samuel Maxwell in 28 Am. L. Rev. p. 211, on the subject of "Necessity for the Suppression of Lobbying," that "a lawyer may be entitled to compensation for writing a petition or even for making a public argument before the legislature or a committee thereof; but the law should not help him or any other person to a recompense for exercising any personal influence in any way in any act of the legislature. It is certainly important to just and wise legislation, and therefore to the most essential interests of the public, that the legislature be perfectly free from any extraneous influence which may either corrupt or deceive the members or any of them." The contract declared upon, and especially as shown by the evidence, was both specific and general in its terms relative to what was to be done by the plaintiff, and, moreover, it provided for a contingent fee,—an indefinite sum, but a liberal one, if the act passed; nothing, if it failed. The contract, if ever made, was vicious and illegal, and there could be no recovery under it, nor as upon an implied contract, nor upon a quantum meruit. Wood v. McCann, 6 Dana, 366; Marshall v. Baltimore & C. R. Co. 16 How. 315. 14 L. ed. 953; Coquillard v. Bearss, 21 Ind. 479. 83 Am. Dec. 362; Harris v. Roof, 10 Barb. 489; Weed v. Black, 2 MacArth. 268; Chippewa Valley & S. R. Co. v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 75 Wis. 224, 6 L. R. A. 601, 44 N. W. 17. It was decided in the cases just quoted that a contract, the nature of the one in suit, which provided for contingent fee or compensation, is illegal and void, because such fee or compensation is a "direct and strong incentive to the exertion of not merely personal, but sinister, influence upon the legislature." It follows that the judgment of the District Court must be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Alfred Lyman DARROW et al., Appts.,
v.
Lyman Darrow CALKINS et al., Respts.

(154 N. Y. 503.)

1. Nonresident infants are not bound by a judgment settling their rights in real estate belonging to a partnership of which their deceased father was a member, entered before the service of summons by publication was complete, so that there was no jurisdiction to appoint a guardian ad litem for them.
2. Partnership real estate retains its character of realty in the absence of any express or implied agreement to the contrary between the partners, for the purpose of adjusting the rights of a surviving partner and the heirs of a deceased one, except so far as is necessary to adjust the partnership obligations and the accounts between the partners.
3. The intention to convert real estate into personality is manifested by its purchase for partnership purposes with partnership funds, and its use in the partnership business indiscriminately with chattel property.
4. A conveyance of his interest in the partnership real estate by one partner to the other in trust to hold as partnership property, and to return the proper portion of the proceeds at the winding up of the partnership, is not in contravention of § 55 of the statute of uses and trusts, which contemplated merely the creation of original trusts.
5. A conveyance of his undivided half in the partnership real estate by one partner to the other, to be held as partnership property, with power to manage and sell, and to pay over to the grantor, his heirs, assigns, or other legal representatives "such portion thereof as shall, at the closing of the partnership business," belong to the grantor, discloses an intention to change the interest of the grantor and his representatives from one in lands to one in the surplus which shall remain after a sale of the property and the adjustment of the partnership affairs.
6. The heirs of a deceased partner are not necessary parties to a proceeding to adjust the partnership affairs, although a part of the assets consists of real estate, if, as between the partners and their representatives, it has been converted into personality.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, granting a new trial upon exceptions heard before it in the first instance after verdict in plaintiffs' favor at a Special Term for Kings County in an action brought to obtain partition of certain lands which were alleged to have been part of the partnership assets of a firm of which plaintiffs' ancestor was a member. Affirmed.

As to the position of tenants in dower and by 48 L. R. A.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J.:

The action was for partition of certain lands in the city of Brooklyn. The plaintiffs, as children and heirs at law of one Edwin J. Darrow, who died intestate November 13, 1864, claimed title to one undivided half of such land, subject to the dower right of two of the defendants, as set forth in the complaint. The defendants, Calkins, are the widow and three children of one Daniel O. Calkins, who died intestate July 20, 1887. It is alleged in the complaint that Edwin J. Darrow, at the time of his death, "was seised in fee simple" of the undivided one half of the premises sought to be partitioned, and Daniel O. Calkins of the other undivided one half. It alleges that on the 25th day of September, 1861, the said Edwin J. Darrow, together with his wife, Lucy P. Darrow, made and executed "a certain deed in trust" bearing date on that day, which was recorded in the county of Kings, January 19, 1865, whereby the said Edwin J. Darrow and his wife conveyed all their estate in the aforesaid real property to the said Daniel O. Calkins "to have and to hold, to control and manage, sell and convey the whole or any part of said premises as part of the partnership property of the aforesaid Calkins and Darrow, and to pay over to the said Darrow, his heirs and assigns, or other legal representatives, such portion thereof as shall, at the closing of the partnership business of said Calkins and Darrow, belong to or be due or coming to the said Darrow, his heirs, executors, assigns, or other legal representatives." It alleges, in substance, that a copartnership had existed up to the death of Darrow in 1864, between him and Calkins, under the firm name of Calkins & Darrow; that the trust upon which the deed of September 25, 1861, was made had not been performed; that no accounting had been had to "these plaintiffs or to any court having jurisdiction in the matter;" that the copartnership had long since ceased and terminated; that there were no outstanding debts of the firm, and that the purpose of the said trust had ceased to exist, and the trust, if ever operative, had terminated.

The interests of the respective parties, as claimed by the plaintiffs, are set forth, in substance, that the plaintiffs are each entitled to an undivided fourth part of the premises, and the children of Calkins to the other one-half part, subject to dower interests as stated.

The complaint further states that a "certain pretended" judgment was entered on the 31st day of October, 1867, in the supreme court of the state of New York, in an action brought by Lucy P. Darrow (the widow of the curtesy, and of the heirs and personal representatives of a deceased partner in relation to partnership real estate, see Woodward-Holmes Co. v. Nudd (Minn.) 27 L. R. A. 840.

The position of surviving partners in partnership real estate is also discussed in Galbraith v. Tracy (Ill.) 28 L. R. A. 129.

Edwin J. Darrow), as administratrix of his estate, against Daniel O. Calkins and others, for the purpose of ascertaining "what interest such administratrix had, if any, in the copartnership effects of the firm of Calkins & Darrow," by which judgment it was decreed that the plaintiffs (in this action) had no title or interest in the lands or real estate described in the complaint in that action, which included the premises sought to be partitioned in this action; that the present plaintiffs were infants and nonresidents of the state when the former action was brought, and that they were not legally brought in as parties to that action, and were not bound by the appearance of the guardian ad litem for them therein, and that the judgment as to them was without jurisdiction and void. The complaint prayed judgment for partition according to the interests as set forth in the complaint.

The defendants, Calkins, answered the complaint, and, among other things, alleged that Daniel O. Calkins, at the time of his death, was the sole owner of the lands described in the complaint, and that prior to his death he had fully performed all the terms and conditions contained in the deed of September 25, 1861, and that upon his death the lands descended to his children and heirs at law, subject to the dower right of his widow. The defendants, Calkins, further set up the judgment rendered in the action brought by the administratrix of Edwin J. Darrow against Daniel O. Calkins in bar of the present action, and also the statute of limitations.

On the trial the plaintiffs put in evidence deeds of four parcels of land, comprising forty-eight city lots in the city of Brooklyn, including the premises sought to be partitioned in this action, executed to Daniel O. Calkins and Edwin J. Darrow in the years 1850, 1852, 1853, and 1854. Also the deed of September 25, 1861, from Darrow and his wife to Calkins, hereinbefore referred to. This deed purported to convey to Calkins for the consideration expressed of $1, all the right, title, and interest of Daniel and his wife in and to the real estate described therein in full and ample terms, as in a deed of bargain and sale, followed by the habendum in the words hereinbefore stated. The plaintiffs further read from the answer of Daniel O. Calkins in the suit brought against him by the administratrix of Darrow (as admissions binding upon the defendants in this action), certain paragraphs for the purpose, among other things, of showing that at the time of the commencement of that action there were assets of the firm in the hands of Calkins (other than the real property of the partnership) sufficient to pay all the debts of the firm and to adjust the accounts as between the partners. The plaintiffs then rested.

The defendants thereupon offered in evidence the judgment roll in the former action brought by the administratrix of Darrow. Its admission was objected to by the plaintiffs on the ground that the judgment in that action was not binding upon them, for the reason that it was rendered before the court had acquired any jurisdiction over their persons. The court sustained the objection and excluded the judgment, except that it was admitted for the single purpose of laying the foundation of a title by adverse possession under the statute of limitations. The defendants then gave evidence tending to establish that from the time of the rendition of the judgment of October 31, 1867, Daniel O. Calkins and his children had been in adverse possession of the lands in question, claiming title under the judgment.

The following facts are disclosed by the record in the former action: In general, the action was brought by the administratrix of the deceased partner in the firm of Calkins & Darrow against Calkins, the surviving partner, and certain persons to whom he had contracted to sell certain of the lands conveyed to him by the deed of September 25, 1861, for an accounting of the affairs of the partnership, and to have the rights of the respective partners in the partnership property adjudged and determined.

The complaint set out the deed of September 25, 1861; averred that the lands embraced therein were held by Calkins as copartnership property to be by him disposed of as "assets of the firm:" that he had made certain pretended and collusive sales; that no settlement of the partnership accounts had ever been had; that Calkins had neglected and refused to account to the plaintiff as administratrix of Darrow, and in fraud of the partnership was applying the partnership property to his own use, etc.

Calkins, the surviving partner, in his answer denied all allegations of fraud; admitted in substance that the lands held by him under the deed of September 25, 1861, were copartnership property; that upon a settlement of the copartnership business and the sale of the land and real estate held under that deed, a considerable sum of money would be found to be due to the estate of Darrow; that he was anxious to have a settlement of the partnership business, and near the close of his answer he alleged that he was advised that the interest of Darrow "in the proceeds" of the lands was an interest in lands which, on his death, descended to his two infant children (the present plaintiffs); and (the answer proceeds) "he submits to the court that the children and heirs of said Edwin J. Darrow should have been made parties to this action." After the service of the answer the court, on the application of the attorneys for the plaintiff, and on the 15th of October, 1867, made an order amending the summons and complaint by adding the names of the present plaintiffs and defendants, and on the 18th day of October, 1867, made an order for the service of the amended summons upon them by publication, it appearing that they were infants and nonresidents of this state, and resided at Hartford, Connecticut. On the 22d day of October, 1867, the summons was personally served upon them at Hartford. On the 24th day of October, on the petition of their mother, an attorney of the court was appointed their guardian ad litem in this action, who put in an answer submitting their rights and interests to the protection of the court. Thereafter, on the 31st of October, the final decree was entered. By this decree it was, among other things, adjudged that the interest of Edwin J. Darrow in the lands and real estate and the proceeds thereof was personal estate, and belonged to the plaintiff as administratrix; that the infant defendants (the present plaintiffs) had no title or interest therein as heirs of Edwin J. Darrow; that the assets of the copartnership of Calkins and Darrow, including contracts for the sale of real estate, were worth about $28,000, and that the "plaintiff and defendant Daniel O. Calkins, on a full accounting between them as to said estate, having agreed upon the sum of $14,000 as the present actual value of the interest of the estate of the said Edwin J. Darrow in the said copartnership property," therefore, etc. The decree further provided that the said Calkins pay the plaintiff as administratrix said sum of $14,000, and that "thenceforward all the estate, rights, interests, property, and assets of the said firm shall belong to and be the property of the said Daniel O. Calkins as his own proper goods and chattels, and credits, lands, and tenements." Calkins paid the $14,000 as required by the judgment, and entered into possession of all the real estate embraced in the deed of September 25, 1861, not previously sold.

The defense of the statute of limitations rests upon the following undisputed facts: (1) Death of Darrow (the ancestor) November 12, 1864; (2) he left two infant children (the plaintiffs); (3) adverse possession commenced October, 1867; (4) the infant children of Darrow were then nine and eleven years of age respectively; (5) one became of age in 1877 and one in 1879; (6) this action was commenced in June, 1894, twenty-seven years after the commencement of adverse possession and fifteen years after the youngest child became of age.

Mr. Charles N. Morgan, with Mr. Frederick B. Bailey, for appellants:

In the absence of an express or implied agreement to the contrary, real estate purchased by a copartnership with copartnership funds is at all times and for all purposes real estate, having all the legal qualities and incidents of real estate, and as such descends to the heirs at law of a deceased partner to the extent of his interest or share therein.

The purchase of real estate with funds of the copartnership for use in its business, and such use, have been held to imply an agreement that it should be personal assets for all purposes. Especially where it forms but a minor part of the whole capital, or its value depends largely upon its association with and dependence upon the business.

Dawson v. Parsons, 10 Misc. 428, 31 N. Y. Supp. 78; McFarlane v. McFarlane, 82 Hun, 238, 31 N. Y. Supp. 272; Perin v. McGibben, 6 U. S. App. 348, 53 Fed. Rep. 86, 3 C. C. A. 443; Buckley v. Buckley, 11 Barb. 43.

But when the purchase is a mere incident of the business, and made with funds not employed in the business, the legal character and incidents of such real estate are, in the absence of any express agreement to the contrary, to be determined by other and different considerations.

Three theories exist in respect of partnership real estate:

1. That all real estate purchased with partnership funds is ipso facto converted into personality for all purposes and in respect of all persons. This is sometimes termed the theory of "out-and-out" conversion.

2. That immediately upon such purchase it is equitably converted into personality and continues to be such until the partnership affairs are finally wound up and adjusted, whereupon there is a reconversion into reality of the surplus remaining of such real estate, which descends to the heir of a deceased partner, and does not go to his personal representatives.

3. That real estate purchased by a partnership remains real estate; that no equitable or other conversion into personality takes place except when and to the extent that it is necessary in order to discharge partnership obligations; that the right of the several partners to require that the property shall be applied to the satisfaction of partnership obligations is of the nature of a lien or charge on the real estate, and that, subject to such lien or charge, such property is and remains always real estate and subject to all the incidents and qualities of real estate.

The third theory only can be logically sustained on principle, or consistently applied; it is sanctioned by the better authorities in this country.

There is no equitable conversion, and no necessity for such conversion.

Fairchild v. Fairchild, 64 N. Y. 471; Re Codding, 9 Fed. Rep. 849; Campbell v. Campbell, 30 N. J. Eq. 415; Story, Eq. Jur. 1243; Wilcox v. Wilcox, 13 Allen, 252; Shearer v. Shearer, 98 Mass. 107.

The true theory rests wholly in the legal relations between the partners, making each the agent or trustee of the others in respect of the partnership affairs and business.

This right is an equitable right, and the power is an equitable trust power, both having their origin in the legal relation subsisting between the partners as such, and the lawful exercise of such power depends upon the existence of partnership obligations as a condition precedent.

Shanks v. Klein, 104 U. S. 18, 26 L. ed. 635; Greenwood v. Marvin, 111 N. Y. 423, 19 N. E. 228; Buchan v. Sumner, 2 Barb. Ch. 165, 47 Am. Dec. 305; Greene v. Graham, 5 Ohio, 205.

Before equity will aid this equitable trust power by decreeing conveyance by the heir, the necessity therefor must affirmatively appear.

The doctrine of absolute "conversion" and "reconversion" involves, as a necessary corollary, the doctrine of survivorship in respect of all the partnership property, both real and personal.

The doctrine of unlimited survivorship in real estate owned by partners finds no support in text-books or in any controlling case; it is distinctly and uniformly rejected.

Y. 471; Campbell v. Campbell, 30 N. J. Eq. 415; Greene v. Graham, 5 Ohio, 264; Wilcox v. Wilcox, 13 Allen, 252; Shearer v. Shearer, 98 Mass. 107; Re Coddington, 9 Fed. Rep. 849; Sage v. Sherman, 2 N. Y. 432.

Darrow was seised in fee of an undivided half of the premises, and his deed to Calkins Sept. 25, 1861, did not convey the legal title to Darrow's half, but, at most, gave a power in trust in respect thereto.

Heernans v. Robertson, 64 N. Y. 332; Wright v. Delafield, 23 Barb. 498.

A trust in Calkins for partitioning the land between the partners or their heirs would be invalid as such, but good as a power in trust.

Cooke v. Platt, 98 N. Y. 35.

All the trusts could be performed through the medium of a power, and a legal estate in the donee of the power will not be implied.

Nicoll v. Walworth, 4 Denio, 385.

Messrs. William R. Syme and Daniel Daly, for respondents:

The deed of 1861 conveyed the whole estate of Edwin J. Darrow to Daniel O. Calkins, and Darrow retained only a right to share the proceeds of a sale of said property.

Mott v. Richtmyer, 57 N. Y. 49; 4 Kent, Com. 468; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 372; Jackson ex dem. Bird v. Ireland, 3 Wend. 100; Kenney v. Wallace, 24 Hun, 478.

Even were the appellants' claim maintained, that the conveyance effected by the deed was in trust, they could not maintain partition, for a cestui que trust cannot maintain partition.

Harris v. Larkins, 22 Hun, 488; McLean v. McLean, 50 N. Y. S. R. 509, 21 N. Y. Supp. 326.

Whether the deed of 1861 be an absolute conveyance, a conveyance in trust, or a power in trust, it certainly contains a power of sale, and is therefore a bar to partition.

Morse v. Morse, 85 N. Y. 53; Davies v. Davies, 15 N. Y. Week. Dig. 118, Affirmed in 92 N. Y. 633.

The judgment in the action of Darrow's Administratrix v. Calkins would be conclusive upon the appellants, even if they had not been made parties thereto.

As copartnership property it was personality, and not until the copartnership creditors were paid and the interests of the copartners were adjusted, did it resume its character as real estate.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are relieved on this appeal from the inquiry which frequently arises between copartners and copartnership and individual creditors, whether real estate purchased and conveyed to the copartners during the existence of the firm, by a conveyance which in form created a tenancy in common, is to be regarded as belonging to them collectively as partnership property, or as the individual property of each according to the interests disclosed on the face of the deed. The finding of the trial court, which is not assailed by any exception, is express, that the lands purchased by Daniel O. Calkins and Edwin J. Darrow were purchased by them as copartners out of the funds of the firm of Calkins & Darrow, and the deed executed by Darrow to Calkins on the 25th of September, 1861, upon which both the plaintiffs and the defendants rely as determining the character of the ownership, expressly declares in the habendum that the lands were partnership property of Calkins and Darrow. We are to assume, therefore, that the lands were originally purchased out of partnership funds, with the intention on the part of each partner that they should be held as partnership property, subject to administration under the rules governing the rights and interests of copartners in lands purchased by them to be held as the property of the partnership. The partners as between themselves made the lands partnership property, and the rights of creditors of the firm or of the individual partners are not involved. The only question here is between the plaintiffs as heirs of Darrow, and the children of Calkins, and it turns mainly on the question whether upon the death of Darrow in 1864 an undivided half part of the lands to which he acquired the legal title by the deeds running jointly to himself and Calkins, executed between 1850 and 1854, descended to and vested in the plaintiffs as his heirs at law. The plaintiffs at the death of Darrow were infants, and although this action was not commenced until thirty years after his death, nor until fifteen years after the younger of the plaintiffs became of age, it seems, under the case of Howell v. Leavitt, 95 N. Y. 617, the plaintiffs, although they have slumbered upon their rights during an adverse possession of twenty-seven years, were not barred by the statute of limitations. So, also, we think it must be held that they were not barred by the adjudication in the decree of October 31, 1867, in the action brought by the administratrix of Darrow against Calkins for the settlement of the partnership affairs, which declared that "they had no title or interest in the said lands and real estate as heirs of the said Edwin J. Darrow, deceased, or otherwise." The service of the summons on the infants by publication was not completed when the judgment was entered, and until the period of publication had expired the court could acquire no jurisdiction to appoint a guardian ad litem or to render a judgment binding upon them as parties to the action. Brooklyn Trust Co. v. Bulmer, 49 N. Y. 84; Crouter v. Crouter, 133 N. Y. 55, 30 N. E. 726.

The legal nature and incidents of land purchased by a copartnership with copartnership funds is a subject upon which great diversity of opinion exists in different jurisdictions. The English rule, after many fluctuations, has, as we understand the cases, come to be, that lands so purchased, whether purchased for or used for partnership purposes or not, provided only that they were intended by the partners to constitute a part of the partnership property, become ipso facto, in the view of a court of equity, converted into personality for all purposes,—as well for the purpose of the adjustment of the partnership debts and the claims of the partners inter se, as for the purpose of determining the succession as between the personal representatives of a deceased partner and the heir at law. Darby v. Darby, 3 Drew. 495; Essex v. Essex, 20 Beav. 442; Lindley, Partn. 3d ed. 681 et seq. This doctrine had its origin in England, and is said to have grown out of the peculiar law of inheritance there, and to remedy the hardship of the rule which excludes all but the eldest child from the inheritance, and of the other rule which exempts real estate in the hands of the heir from all but the specialty debts of the ancestor. Fairchild v. Fairchild, 64 N. Y. 471; Shearer v. Shearer, 98 Mass. 114. Lindley, in his work on Partnership, bases the rule on the nature of the interest of each partner in the partnership property. He says (p. 687) [5th ed. *343]: "From the principle that a share of a partner is nothing more than his proportion of the partnership assets after they have been turned into money and applied in liquidation of the partnership debts, it necessarily follows that in equity a share in a partnership, whether its property consists of land or not, must, as between the real and personal representatives of a deceased partner, be deemed to be personal, and not real, estate, unless, indeed, such conversion is inconsistent with the agreement between the parties." The concluding words of the paragraph quoted concede that the intention of the parties will prevent a conversion where that intention is manifested. The general doctrine of "out and out" conversion adopted by the English courts has not been followed to its full extent in this and many other American states. There is no policy growing out of our laws of inheritance or the exemption of lands from liability for simple contract debts, which requires the application of such a doctrine here. The lands of the ancestor are assets for the payment of all debts, and the persons who take by descent and under the statute of distribution are substantially the same. The necessity for an absolute conversion, supposed to be found in the nature of a partnership interest, seems hardly sufficient to justify a fiction which should deprive real estate of a partnership of its descendible quality when it is admitted on all hands that partnership real estate if the necessity arises is first subject to be appropriated in equity to the discharge of partnership obligations and the adjustment of the equities between the parties.

The clear current of the American decisions supports the rule that in the absence of any agreement, express or implied, between the partners to the contrary, partnership real estate retains its character as realty with all the incidents of that species of property between the partners themselves, and also between a surviving partner and the real and personal representatives of a deceased partner, except that each share is impressed with a trust implied by law in favor of the other partner, that so far as is necessary it shall be first applied to the adjustment of partnership obligations and the payment of any balance found to be due from the one partner to the other on winding up the partnership affairs. To the extent necessary for these purposes the character of the property is in equity deemed to be changed into personality. On the death of either partner, where the title is vested in both, the share of the land standing in the name of the deceased partner descends as real estate to his heirs, subject to the equity of the surviving partner to have it appropriated to accomplish the trust to which it was primarily subjected. The working out of the mutual rights which grew out of the partnership relation does not seem to require that the character of the property should be changed until the occasion arises for a conversion, and then only to the extent required. The American rule commends itself for its simplicity. It makes the legal title subservient in equity to the original trust. It disturbs it no further than is necessary for this purpose. The portion of the land not required for partnership equities retains its character as realty, and it leaves the laws of inheritance and descent to their ordinary operation. It would be useless to review in detail the authorities which seem to us to maintain what has been called the American rule. We refer to a very few of them. Buchan v. Sumner, 2 Barb. Ch. 167, 47 Am. Dec. 305; Collumb v. Read, 24 N. Y. 505; Fairchild v. Fairchild, 64 N. Y. 471; Shearer v. Shearer, 98 Mass. 114; Shanks v. Klein, 104 U. S. 18, 26 L. ed. 635.

If, as sometimes happens, the title to partnership real estate is in the name of one of the partners only, on the death of the other partner his equitable title descends to his heirs or goes to his devisees, but subject to the primary claims growing out of the partnership relation. Fairchild v. Fairchild, 64 N. Y. 471; Parsons, Partn. § 272. But the general principles to which we have adverted are those applied by courts of equity in determining the character and incidents of partnership real estate, in the absence of any agreement, express or implied, between the partners on the subject. It is, however, generally conceded that the question whether partnership real estate shall be deemed absolutely converted into personality for all purposes, or only converted pro tanto for the purpose of partnership equities, may be controlled by the express or implied agreement of the partners themselves, and that where by such agreement it appears that it was the intention of the partners that the lands should be treated and administered as personality for all purposes, effect will be given thereto. In respect to real estate purchased for partnership purposes with partnership funds and used in the prosecution of the partnership business, the English rule of "out and out" conversion may be regarded as properly applied on the ground of intention, even in jurisdictions which have not adopted that rule as applied to partnership real estate acquired under different circumstances, and where no specific intention appeared. The investment of partnership funds in lands and chattels for the purpose of a partnership business, the fact that the two species of property are in most cases of this kind so commingled that they cannot be separated without impairing the value of each, has been deemed to justify the inference that under such circumstances the lands as well as the chattels were intended by the partners to constitute a part of the partnership stock, and that both together should take the character of personality for all purposes; and Judge Denio in Collumb v. Read, 24 N. Y. 505, expressed the opinion that to this extent the English rule of conversion prevailed here. That paramount consideration should be given to the intention of the partners, when ascertained, is conceded by most of the cases. See Howie v. Carr, 1 Sumn. 183, Fed. Cas. No. 6,802; Fall River Whaling Co. v. Borden, 10 Cush. 462; Collumb v. Read, 24 N. Y. 505; Parsons, Partn. § 267.

The legal title to the real estate which the heirs of Edwin J. Darrow asked to have partitioned in this action was vested in Daniel O. Calkins at the time of the death of Darrow in November, 1864. The plaintiffs on the death of their father took no legal estate in the lands. The legal estate which prior to the 25th day of September, 1861, Darrow held in the undivided one half of the premises was by the deed executed by him on that day conveyed to Calkins. That this was the effect of the deed we have no doubt. The deed is in terms full and ample to convey in fee the interest of Darrow to his grantee. It was coupled, however, with the declaration on the face of the deed that it was to be held by Calkins as partnership property, and the deed contained a power of management and sale, and this was followed by the significant clause, "and to pay over to the said Darrow, his heirs and assigns, or other legal representatives, such portion thereof as shall, at the closing of the partnership business of said Calkins and Darrow, belong to or be due or coming to said Darrow, his heirs, executors, assigns, or other legal representatives." The suggestion that the deed attempted to create an express trust in lands, not within the enumerated trusts permitted by § 55 of our statute of uses and trusts (1 Rev. Stat. 728), and was therefore void as a conveyance, is not well founded. It recognized a pre-existing trust imposed upon the lands, implied by law and arising out of the partnership relation, and that the trust was to continue notwithstanding the conveyance of the legal title. This was not, we think, in contravention of the statute, which contemplated the creation of original trusts, and not the abrogation of existing trusts resulting from or implied by operation of law; nor did it render inoperative the subsequent recognition of such an existing trust in connection with a conveyance of the legal title. We think the legal title to the one-half part of the land passed by Darrow's deed, subject to the performance by Calkins of the trust therein declared. The important question is, whether it operated to convert the partnership lands into personality, and to change the interest of Darrow, or his representatives, from an interest in the land as realty into an interest in the proceeds of the lands, after a sale thereof by Calkins under the power contained in the deed.

We are of opinion that it was the intention of the partners, disclosed on the face of the deed and by the surrounding circumstances, to substitute in place of Darrow's prior interest in the lands, as such, an interest in him and his representatives in any surplus which should remain after a sale by Calkins and the adjustment of the partnership affairs. It is not necessary to decide whether the surplus, when ascertained, would go to the real or personal representatives of Darrow. As between Darrow and his representatives, and Calkins and his representatives, the deed operated as a conversion of the lands into personality. The personal representatives of Darrow were entitled to enforce, in an action for an accounting and an adjustment of the partnership affairs, the claims of Darrow's estate. This was the purpose of the action which resulted in the decree of October 31, 1867, and we think that decree was binding upon the plaintiffs, not on the ground that they were parties, but for the reason that no controversy existing as to the original character of the property as partnership property, or as to the subsequent dealing between the partners in respect to it, the heirs of Darrow were not necessary parties to a final adjustment of the partnership affairs, including the interest of the Darrow estate growing out of his relation to the lands under the deed of September 25, 1861. It was open to the plaintiffs on an accounting by the administratrix of the Darrow estate to claim that the $14,000 received by her under the decree in the action for an accounting should be regarded as real, and not personal, assets, and that they were entitled to it in their character as heirs, and not as distributees.

We think the order of the court below reversing the judgment at Special Term was correct, and it should, therefore, be affirmed, and judgment absolute entered for the defendants on the stipulation, with costs.

All concur.

There is nothing in the act in question which prohibits any person interested in affixing the stamp provided by the law to documents of the character offered as evidence

I. Applicability of revenue laws to state courts.

a. Provisions excluding unstamped instruments from evidence.

Many of the state courts held that the provisions of the acts of 1864, 1865, and 1866, excluding unstamped instruments from evidence, did not apply to state courts.

Some of the cases denied the power of Congress to prescribe a rule of evidence for the state courts. Thus, Bumpass v. Taggart, 26 Ark. 398, 7 Am. Rep. 623; Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 617; Bennett v. Morris (Cal.) 37 Pac. 929; Latham v. Smith, 45 Ill. 29; Craig v. Dimock, 47 Ill. 309; Bunker v. Green, 48 Ill. 243; United States Exp. Co. v. Haines, 48 Ill. 248; Hanford v. Obrecht, 49 Ill. 146; Wilson v. McKenna, 52 Ill. 43; Bowen v. Byrne, 55 Ill. 467; Wallace v. Cravens, 34 Ind. 534; Hunter v. Cobb, 1 Bush. 239; Pargoud v. Richardson, 30 La. Ann. 1286; Holt v. Hart Bd. of Liquidators, 33 La. Ann. 673; Davis v. Richardson, 45 Miss. 499, 7 Am. Rep. 732; More v. Clymer, 12 Mo. App. 11; Sporrer v. Elfler, 1 Heisk. 633; Schultz v. Herndon, 32 Tex. 390; Jacobs v. Spofford, 34 Tex. 153.

The following cases formally based their decisions that the provision was inapplicable to the state courts upon the language of the acts, rather than upon the want of power in Congress to make them so apply: Trowbridge v. Addams, 23 Colo. 518, 48 Pac. 535; Griffin v. Ranney, 35 Conn. 239; Rockwell v. Hunt, 40 Conn. 328; Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 453; Lynch v. Morse, 97 Mass. 458; Green v. Holway, 101 Mass. 243, 3 Am. Rep. 339; Moore v. Quirk, 105 Mass. 49, 7 Am. Rep. 499; Clemens v. Conrad, 19 Mich. 170; People ex rel. Harbour v. Gates, 43 N. Y. 40; Haight v. Grist, 64 N. C. 739; Stewart v. Hopkins, 30 Ohio St. 502; Dalley v. Coker, 33 Tex. 815, 7 Am. Rep. 270; Hale v. Wilkinson, 21 Gratt. 75; Tolley v. Robinson, 22 Gratt. 888; Weltner v. Riggs, 3 W. Va. 445.

The decisions in many of these cases, however, were largely influenced by the doubt which the courts entertained as to the power of Congress in the premises. That was true of Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452, which was followed by many of the other cases.

In accordance with the foregoing decisions, under the earlier acts it has been held that the provision of the act of 1898, excluding unstamped instruments from evidence, does not in this case at any time before their admission as evidence.

If the view of the law taken by the lower court was correct, and it is necessary under this revenue law to obtain the consent of the collector of internal revenue in order to have the stamps legally affixed where they are omitted at the time, then the affidavit filed by the plaintiff in support of a new trial upon the ground of accident and mistake which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against shows a sufficient case to justify the granting of a new trial upon this ground.

Hopcock v. Stone, 49 Barb. 524; Ohinn v. Taylor, 64 Tex. 385; State v. Williams, 27 Vt. 724; 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 743; Bank of Tennessee v. Cowan, 7 Humph. 70.

Messrs. Goodwin & Dodge, for respondent:

The documentary evidence offered, being apply to the state courts. Loring v. Chase, 26 Misc. 318, 50 N. Y. Supp. 312; People ex rel. Consumers' Brew. Co. v. Fromme, 35 App. Div. 459, 54 N. Y. Supp. 833; Gregory v. Hitchcock Pub. Co. 63 N. Y. Supp. 975; Cassidy v. St. Germain (R. I.) 46 Atl. 35.

It seems, therefore, that the majority of the cases decided under the earlier acts, and all those decided under the act of 1898, in which the question has been expressly determined, hold that the provision excluding unstamped instruments from evidence is inapplicable to the state courts.

A number of cases, however, expressly held that it was applicable; thus:

Section 163 of the act of 1804 applies to the state courts, and governs in respect to the admissibility in evidence of unstamped instruments. Muscatine v. Sterneman, 30 Iowa, 520, 6 Am. Rep. 685.

Chartiers & R. Turnp. Co. v. McNamara, 72 Pa. 278, 13 Am. Rep. 673, held that the provision of the act of July 13, 1866, excluding unstamped instruments from evidence, was applicable to state courts, and was constitutional as so applied. The court said that the abstract proposition that Congress could not pass laws regulating the competency of evidence in the trial of causes in the several states was true, but was misapplied, and that the purpose of Congress was, not to make rules of evidence, but to stamp the instrument of evidence with a disqualification preventing its use as evidence until the delinquent had paid his tax, and that the provision was a proper exercise of the power of Congress to lay taxes.

The court further said that the power to forfeit the subject of the tax as a consequence of evasion or nonpayment was undeniable, and that the argument which affirmed that Congress could not, in order to secure the payment of the stamp duty, regulate the matter of the admissibility of unstamped paper evidencing the owner's right to money or other property, placed the incident on higher ground than the principle, and made the shadow more sacred than the substance. Thompson, Ch. J., and Agnew, J., dissented upon the ground that the legislation altered a rule of evidence belonging to the state tribunals, and Sharswood, J., also dissented from the decision in the case, on what ground it does not appear.

Howe v. Carpenter, 53 Barb. 382, and Davy v. Morgan, 56 Barb. 218, held that the applicability of the provision to the state courts could not be questioned in view of the fact that effect had been frequently given to it. The two latter cases, however, have, in effect, been overruled by 48 L. R. A.

partly stamped and partly unstamped, or irregularly stamped, it was properly rejected by the court.

Belknap, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence two depositions taken under a commission issued to a notary public of the city of San Francisco, state of California, with his certificate thereunto attached. One of these was objected to upon the ground that the stamps required by the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, entitled "An Act to Provide Ways and Means to Meet War Expenditures and for Other Purposes," were not canceled upon the day the certifi-cated by the later New York cases already cited under this division.

Woodson v. Randolph, 1 Va. Cas. 128, which arose under the act of July 6, 1897, held that Congress could exclude unstamped instruments from evidence as an incident of its power to lay and collect taxes.

In addition to the cases that have expressly held that the provision was applicable to the state courts, there is a large number of cases in which the applicability of the provision has been assumed, or, at least, not questioned. It will be observed, however, that in many of these cases the decision was in favor of the admissibility of the instrument, so that the result was the same as if the provision had been held not to be applicable. Some of them, e. g., Plessinger v. Depuy, 25 Ind. 419; Morris v. McMorris, 44 Miss. 441, 7 Am. Rep. 685; Timp v. Dockham, 20 Wis. 440, and Grant v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 29 Wis. 125,—expressly refrained from considering the question. Others, however, held the instruments in question inadmissible, and therefore necessarily implied that the provision was applicable.

b. Provisions invalidating unstamped instruments.

Some of the cases held that neither the validity, nor the admissibility, of unstamped instruments, when the question arose in the state court, was affected by the revenue acts, without apparently making any distinction between the provisions rendering unstamped instruments invalid and those expressly excluding them from evidence. Thus, Bowen v. Byrne, 55 Ill. 468; Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 617; Thomason v. Wood, 42 Cal. 416; Wallace v. Cravens, 34 Ind. 534; Leahy v. Smith, 45 Ill. 29; Craig v. Dimock, 47 N. H. 308; Bunker v. Green, 48 Ill. 243; Hanford v. Obrecht, 40 Ill. 146; Sporrer v. Eider, 1 Hout. 633; More v. Clymer, 12 Mo. App. 11; Hunter v. Cobb, 1 Bush. 239.

It will be observed that neither the decision in Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452, nor the principle upon which it was rendered, nor that Congress merely intended to prescribe a rule of evidence for the Federal courts, did not undertake, even if it could constitutionally do so, to prescribe a rule of evidence for the other courts,—reaches the provisions rendering unstamped instruments inadmissible of no effect. The same is true of the other Massachusetts cases cited under the preceding subdivision, and also of Clemens v. Conrad, 11

cate bears date. The other was objected to upon the ground that the certificate was not stamped as required by the provisions of the before-mentioned law. Each objection was sustained, and the evidence excluded. We have not been referred to any adjudication of the provisions concerning stamped instruments offered in evidence under the act of Congress cited, but substantially the same provisions, contained in the internal revenue law of 1862, have frequently been the subject of judicial construction. One of the early cases under this law was Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452. After stating that the law did not, in terms, extend to state courts,—and the law of 1898 in this respect is the same,—the decision proceeds: "The language of the enactment is only that no instruments or documents not duly stamped shall 'be admitted or used as evidence in any court' until the requisite stamps shall be affixed. This provision can have full operation and effect if construed as intended to apply to those courts only which have been established under the Constitution of the United States and by acts of Congress, over which the Federal legislature can legitimately exercise control, and to which they can properly prescribe rules regulating the course of justice and the mode of administering justice. We are not disposed to give a broader interpretation to the statute. We entertain grave doubts whether it is within the constitutional authority of Congress to enact rules regulating the competency of evidence on the trial of cases in the courts of the several states, which shall be obligatory upon them. We are not aware that the existence of such a power has ever been judicial-

Mich. 170, and People ex rel. Barbour v. Gates, 43 N. Y. 40. The latter two cases, however, were supplemented by later decisions in the respective courts in which they were rendered. Thus, Sammons v. Hallows, 21 Mich. 162, held that Congress had no power to render void a contract made in one of the states between citizens thereof, and which was permitted by the local laws; and Moore v. Moore, 47 N. Y. 467, 7 Am. Rep. 466, after stating that the decision in People ex rel. Barbour v. Gates, 43 N. Y. 40, supra, rested upon the principle that the Federal government could not prescribe a rule of evidence for the state courts, went a step further, and held that Congress could not prescribe a rule for the transfer of property within the state, and accordingly held that a deed was not invalid because not stamped as required by the revenue laws.

Warren v. Paul, 22 Ind. 276; State ex rel. Lakey v. Garton, 32 Ind. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 315; Dawson v. McCarty, 21 Wash. 314, 57 Pac. 816, and Jones v. Keep, 19 Wis. 369,—held that Congress had no power to tax legal proceedings in state courts, and that therefore the omission of a stamp from a writ and process of the state court did not invalidate it.

Walton v. Bryneth, 24 How. Pr. 357, held that Congress might impose a penalty, but could not invalidate the proceedings in an action because of the omission from the summons of the stamp required by the act of 1862.

German Liederkrantz v. Schiemann, 25 How. Pr. 388, on the contrary, held that Congress had power to require summonses in state courts to be stamped, and that a summons issued without such a stamp was ineffectual.

Prather v. Zulauf, 38 Ind. 155, held, upon the authority of Wallace v. Cravens, 34 Ind. 534, and Smith v. Hunter, 33 Ind. 106, that the want of the required stamp did not render a note invalid.

People ex rel. Consumers' Brew. Co. v. Fromme, 35 App. Div. 459, 54 N. Y. Supp. 833, and Gregory v. Hitchcock Pub. Co. 63 N. Y. Supp. 975, held that neither the provision invalidating unstamped instruments, nor that excluding them from evidence, in the act of 1898, is applicable in the state courts; but, as already shown, there is express authority in the earlier New York cases for the decision in respect to the former, as well as in respect to the latter, provision.

c. Provisions as to recording.

It was also expressly held, under the earlier acts, that for the same reason that the clauses excluding unstamped instruments from evidence must be regarded as inapplicable to the state courts, those relating to the recording of unstamped instruments must be held to apply only to such instruments as are required by Federal legislation to be recorded, and to officers under Federal control. Moore v. Quirk, 105 Mass. 49, 7 Am. Rep. 499; Stewart v. Hopkins, 30 Ohio St. 502.

A similar decision is made under the act of 1898, by People ex rel. Consumers' Brew. Co. v. Fromme, 35 App. Div. 459, 54 N. Y. Supp. 833.

II. Intent as affecting consequences of omitting stamp.

a. Generally.

Section 158 of the act of June 30, 1864, provided that "any person . . . who shall make, sign, or issue . . . any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever, . . . without the same being duly stamped, . . . with intent to evade the provisions of this act, shall for every offense forfeit the sum of $200, and such instrument, document, or paper shall be deemed invalid and of no effect." This provision was left undisturbed by the act of March 3, 1865, and the only change made by act of July 13, 1866, § 9, was the addition of the words "not being duly stamped according to law" after the words "and such instrument. . . ."

The great weight of authority held, though not with entire unanimity, that the words "with intent to evade the provisions of this act" qualified the clause rendering unstamped instruments invalid and of no effect, as well as the clause prescribing a pecuniary penalty for failure to affix the stamps, and accordingly established the doctrine that such an intent was necessary to invalidate an instrument for want of a stamp.

The following cases so held in respect to instruments governed by the act of 1864 or that of 1865: Whigham v. Pickett, 43 Ala. 140; Craig v. Dimock, 47 Ill. 308; Dudley v. Wells, 55 Me. 145; Tobey v. Chipman, 13 Allen, 123; Govern v. Littlefield, 13 Allen, 127, note; Willey v. Robinson, 13 Allen, 128, note; Lynch v. Morse, 97 Mass. 458; Morris v. McMorris, 44 Miss. 441, 7 Am. Rep. 695; Waterbury v. McMillan, 46 Miss. 635; Whitehill v. Shickle, 43 Mo. 537; Beebe v. Hutton, 47 Barb. 187; Vorebeck v. Roe, 50 Barb. 302; Howe v. Carpenter, 53 Barb. 382; Caggar v. Lansing, 57 Barb. 421; Quin v. Lloyd, 1 Sweeny, 243; Raird v. Pridmore, 31 How. Pr. 359; Davy v. Morgan, 56 Barb. 222; New Haven & N.

ly sanctioned. There are numerous and weighty arguments against its existence. We cannot hold that there was an intention to exercise it, where, as in the provision now under consideration, the language is fairly susceptible of a meaning which will give it full operation and effect within the recognized scope of the constitutional authority of Congress." In Green v. Holway, 101 Mass. 243, 3 Am. Rep. 339, the same court said: "The decision in Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452, that this enactment must be limited to the courts of the United States, and not be construed to extend to, if, indeed, it could constitutionally bind, the state courts, was made after full consideration, is in accordance with the judgments rendered, without a doubt being raised upon this point, by the supreme courts of Vermont, Maine, and Pennsylvania in the cases above cited, and with the later adjudications of the very question in Griffin v. Ranney, 35 Conn. 239; Craig v. Dimock, 47 Ill. 308; Bunker v. Green, 48 Ill. 243, and United States Exp. Co. v. Haines, 48 Ill. 248, and is in harmony with, if it does not fall within, the principle of construction upon which the amendments of the Consti-

Co. v. Quintard, 37 How. Pr. 29; Harper v. Clark, 17 Ohio St. 190; Gaylor v. Hunt, 23 Ohio St. 255; Stewart v. Hopkins, 30 Ohio St. 502; McGovern v. Hoesback, 53 Pa. 178; Corry Nat. Bank v. Rouse, 3 Pittsb. 18; Hitchcock v. Sawyer, 39 Vt. 412; Weltner v. Riggs, 3 W. Va. 445; Rheinstrom v. Cone, 26 Wis. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 48.

And the following cases so held in respect to instruments governed by act of 1866; Campbell v. Wilcox, 10 Wall. 421, 19 L. ed. 973; Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Edwards, 46 Ala. 267; Foster v. Holley, 49 Ala. 593; Perryman v. Greenville, 51 Ala. 507; Bibb v. Bonds, 57 Ala. 509; Trowbridge v. Addoms, 23 Colo. 518, 48 Pac. 535; Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 167; Sawyer v. Parker, 57 Me. 39; Ogden v. Forney, 33 Iowa, 206; Morgan v. Graham, 35 Iowa, 213; Smith v. Hunter, 33 Ind. 106; Mitchell v. Home Ins. Co. 32 Iowa, 421; Ricord v. Jones, 33 Iowa, 26; Brown v. Thompson, 59 Me. 372; Emery v. Hobson, 63 Me. 33; Black v. Woodrow, 39 Md. 194; Holyoke Mach. Co. v. Franklin Paper Co. 97 Mass. 150; Green v. Holway, 101 Mass. 243, 3 Am. Rep. 339; Moore v. Quirk, 105 Mass. 40; Cabbott v. Radford, 17 Minn. 320, Gil. 296; Sanborn v. Nockin, 20 Minn. 178, Gil. 163; Burnap v. Losey, 1 Lans. 111; Boehne v. Murphy, 46 Mo. 57, 2 Am. Rep. 485; Frink v. Thompson, 4 Lans. 490; Baker v. Baker, 6 Lans. 509; Vall v. Knapp, 49 Barb. 299; Vorebeck v. Roa, 50 Barb. 302; Schermerhorn v. Burgess, 55 Barb. 422; Vaughan v. O'Brien, 57 Barb. 491; Harris v. Trimble, 1 Cln. Sup. Ct. Rep. 108; Arkins v. Plympton, 44 Vt. 21; Grant v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 29 Wis. 125; Timp v. Dockham, 29 Wis. 440; Smith v. Scott, 31 Wis. 437; Fenelon v. Hogoboon, 31 Wis. 172.

As pointed out in the subsequent case of Green v. Holway, 101 Mass. 243, 3 Am. Rep. 339; Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452, assumed, and necessarily implied, that under § 158 the mere omission to affix the stamp did not render the instrument wholly void.

Trull v. Moulton, 12 Allen, 396, also held that a fraudulent intent was necessary to invalidate an unstamped instrument; but it does not appear what statute governed the case.

Section 13 of the act of 1898 contains a provision substantially like that of § 158 of the act of 1864 as amended by the act of 1866, and it has been held, in conformity with the decisions under the earlier acts, that an intent to evade the provisions of the act must be shown in order to invalidate the instrument. Casady v. St. Germain (R. I.) 46 Atl. 35.

The cases of Oxford Iron Co. v. Spradley, 51 Ala. 171; Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Edwards, 46 Ala. 267; Works v. Hershey, 35 Iowa, 340; Dela v. Stanwood, 61 Me. 51; Baker v. Baker, 6 Lans. 509; and Hale v. Wilkinson, 21 Gratt. 75,—applied the doctrine of the foregoing cases to instruments executed before the act of June 30, 1864, which introduced the phrase "with intent to evade the provisions of this act," went into effect. They, however, purport to follow decisions made with reference to the acts of 1864, 1865, and 1866, and do not allude to the change of phraseology introduced by the act of 1864, and upon which the decisions relied on were based.

A few cases held, contrary to the great weight of authority, that the phrase "with intent to evade the provisions of the act" did not qualify the words rendering unstamped instruments invalid and of no effect, and that, therefore, even the inadvertent omission of the required stamp invalidated the instrument. Thus: Hugus v. Strickler, 19 Iowa, 413; O'Hare v. Leonard, 19 Iowa, 515; Miller v. Bone, 19 Iowa, 571; Botkins v. Spurgeon, 20 Iowa, 598; Barney v. Ivins, 22 Iowa, 163; Berry v. Boyd, 28 Iowa, 410; Muscatine v. Sterneman, 30 Iowa, 526, 6 Am. Rep. 685; Maynard v. Johnson, 2 Nev. 16; Wayman v. Torreyson, 4 Nev. 124; Miller v. Morrow, 3 Coldw. 587.

The Iowa cases, however, were expressly overruled by Mitchell v. Home Ins. Co. 32 Iowa, 421, which was decided on the authority of Campbell v. Wilcox, 10 Wall. 421, 19 L. ed. 973, and was followed in Ricord v. Jones, 33 Iowa, 26, Ogden v. Forney, 33 Iowa, 205, and Morgan v. Graham, 35 Iowa, 213.

In Miller v. Larmon, 38 How. Pr. 417 (a county court decision), it was held that the omission of a stamp from a constable's return invalidated the return without reference to the intent. The opinion undertakes to distinguish the case from Beebe v. Hutton, 47 Barb. 187, by reason of the change of phraseology, which, it says, was introduced by the act of March 24, 1867. The reference to the statute is evidently a mistake, as the change on which the court relies is that already alluded to as made by the act of July 13, 1866,—viz: the addition of the words "not being stamped according to law."

The New York cases heretofore cited as arising under the act of 1866 show that the change was not considered to affect the doctrine already established by the cases arising under the acts of 1864 and 1865.

It will be observed that the provision rendering unstamped instruments invalid and of no effect, and that expressly excluding unstamped instruments from evidence, were incorporated in different sections in the earlier acts, as well as in the act of 1898. The section incorporating the latter provision does not contain the qualifying words "with intent to evade the provisions of this act," and it is not always apparent how the obstacle furnished by it to the admission of unstamped instruments was obviated by those courts which held that the instrument was not invalid because there was no intent to evade the act.

Schermerhorn v. Burgess, 55 Barb. 422, expressed the opinion, but did not authoritatively decide, that the provision excluding unstamped instruments from evidence only aptution of the United States securing fundamental rights in the modes of judicial proceedings have been held to apply to such proceedings in the courts of the United States only, and not to those in the courts of the several states. Twitchell v. Pennsylvania, 7 Wall. 321, 19 L. ed. 223, and cases cited; Livingston v. Moore, 7 Pet. 482, 551, 8 L. ed. 755, 781; Com. v. Hitchings, 5 Gray, 482." Decisions contrary to the views here stated were made in the cases of Maynard v. Johnson, 2 Nev. 25, and Wayman v. Torreyson, 4 Nev. 124, but when these cases were decided the effect of congressional legislation upon the jurisdiction and practice of the state courts had not received the careful judicial consideration afterwards given it, and no suggestion was then made that the act of Congress prescribed a rule of evidence for Federal courts only.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

Bonnifield, Ch. J., and Massey, J., concur.

plied to instruments which were invalid for want of a stamp, i. e. when the omission was fraudulent.

That construction of the act may have been assumed by the following cases, which seem to have considered the objection to the admissibility of an unstamped instrument effectually disposed of when it was held that the instrument was not invalid. At all events, they do not otherwise dispose of the provision making unstamped instruments inadmissible as distinguished from the provision making them invalid: Perryman v. Greenville, 51 Ala. 507; Bibb v. Bonds, 57 Ala. 509; Ricord v. Jones, 33 Iowa, 26; Mitchell v. Home Ins. Co. 32 Iowa, 421; Black v. Woodrow, 39 Md. 194; Atkins v. Plympton, 44 Vt. 21.

Beebe v. Hutton, 47 Barb. 187, however, expressly held that the instrument must be stamped before being admitted, even if it were not invalid, and Whigham v. Pickett, 43 Ala. 140, reversed the judgment and remanded the cause to give plaintiff an opportunity to have the stamp affixed by the collector, although it held that the instrument was not invalid for want of a stamp.

In Craig v. Dimock, 47 Ill. 308, the instrument had been stamped by the collector, and in Tobey v. Chipman, 13 Allen. 123, and Morris v. McMorris, 44 Miss. 441, 7 Am. Rep. 695, it was stamped in the presence of the court.

In Beebe v. Hutton, 47 Barb. 187, plaintiff offered to stamp the instrument, and in Davy v. Morgan, 56 Barb. 218, the instrument was excluded, because the intent to evade the act was not negatived.

Again, the provision of the act of June 30, 1864, § 163, excluding unstamped instruments from evidence by its terms, only applied to instruments executed before the passage of the act. As already stated, that section was not disturbed by the act of 1865, and the provision of the act of 1866 with reference to this matter was held to apply only to instruments executed after its adoption (Rheinstrom v. Cone, 26 Wis. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 48), so, it would seem, relatively to unstamped instruments executed after the act of 1864, and before the act of 1866, went into effect, that the only obstacle to admissibility was the provision rendering unstamped instruments invalid and of no effect if the omission was with intent to evade the revenue acts.

That view was taken by Govern v. Littlefield, 13 Allen. 127, note, after the passage of the act of 1865, and by Rheinstrom v. Cone, 26 Wis. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 48, and Gaylor v. Hunt, 23 Ohio St. 255, after the passage of the act of 1866. It may also have been the view of Howe v. Carpenter, 53 Barb. 382, and McGovern v. Hoesback, 53 Pa. 176.

The following cases recognized the necessity of disposing of the express provision excluding unstamped instruments from evidence after holding that an intent to evade the act was necessary to invalidate the instrument, and did so by holding that it did not apply to the 48 L. R. A.

state courts: Trowbridge v. Addams, 23 Colo. 518, 48 Pac. 535; Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452; Lynch v. Morse, 97 Mass. 458; Green v. Holway, 101 Mass. 243, 3 Am. Rep. 339; Stewart v. Hopkins, 30 Ohio St. 502; Quin v. Lloyd, 1 Sweeny, 253; and Emery v. Hobson, 63 Me. 33.

The following cases did not involve the question as to admissibility, but only that of validity: Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 167; Smith v. Hunter, 33 Ind. 100; Sawyer v. Parker, 57 Me. 39; Brown v. Thompson, 59 Me. 372; Baird v. Fridmore, 31 How. Pr. 859; New Haven & N. Co. v. Quintard, 37 How. Pr. 29; Burnap v. Losey, 1 Lans. 111; Vorebeck v. Roe, 50 Barb. 302; Vail v. Knapp, 49 Barb. 299; Vaughn v. O'Brien, 57 Barb. 491; Moore v. Quirk, 105 Mass. 49; 7 Am. Rep. 499; Cabbott v. Radford, 17 Minn. 320, Gil. 296; Hale v. Wilkinson, 21 Gratt, 75.

b. Presumption and burden of proof as to intent.

The weight of authority in those courts which hold that the intent characterizing the omission is material places the burden of proving an intent to evade the statute upon the party objecting to the admissibility, or questioning the validity, of the unstamped instrument. Perryman v. Greenville, 51 Ala. 507; Bibb v. Bonds, 57 Ala. 509; Whigham v. Pickett, 43 Ala. 140; Mitchell v. Home Ins. Co. 32 Iowa, 421; Trowbridge v. Addams, 23 Colo. 518, 48 Pac. 535; Ricord v. Jones, 33 Iowa, 26; Ogden v. Forney, 33 Iowa, 205; Works v. Hershey, 35 Iowa, 340; Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 167; Sawyer v. Parker, 57 Me. 39; Brown v. Thompson, 59 Me. 372; Dela v. Stanwood, 61 Me. 51; Black v. Woodrow, 39 Md. 194; Morris v. McMorris, 44 Miss. 441, 7 Am. Rep. 695; Waterbury v. McMillan, 46 Miss. 635; New Haven & N. Co. v. Quintard, 37 How. Pr. 29; Caggar v. Lansing, 57 Barb. 421; Burnap v. Losey, 1 Lans. 111; Baker v. Baker, 6 Lans. 509; Quin v. Lloyd, 1 Sweeny, 253; Smith v. Scott, 31 Wis. 437; Cassidy v. St. Germain (R. I.) 46 Atl. 35; McGovern v. Hoesback, 53 Pa. 176; Grant v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 29 Wis. 123; Timp v. Dockham, 29 Wis. 440.

Howe v. Carpenter, 53 Barb. 382, however, expressly holds that the burden was upon the party offering an unstamped instrument in evidence or asserting its validity, to negative an intent to evade the statute, and a similar decision was made by Beebe v. Hutton, 47 Barb. 187; Davy v. Morgan, 56 Barb. 218; and Baird v. Fridmore, 31 How. Pr. 859.

Byington v. Oaks, 32 Iowa, 488, held that the intentional omission of a stamp, the parties denying the constitutionality of the law as applied to the instrument in question, was the equivalent of an "intent to evade."

III. Scope of acts, generally; effect of repeal.

It was unnecessary, under the act of 1863, to affix a stamp to a promissory note executed in a foreign country and payable generally. Blunt v. Bates, 40 Ala. 470.

A note made prior to the passage of the law requiring notes to be stamped is inadmissible until stamped, but is not void, under act of June 30, 1864, § 163, requiring such notes to be stamped before they can be used as evidence in any court, and authorizing parties to affix the requisite stamps in the presence of the court. McLearn v. Skelton, 18 La. Ann. 514.

The repeal by U. S. Stat. at L. 1871-72, p. 256, § 36, of all taxes imposed by stamps under and by virtue of schedule B of § 170 of the act of June 30, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof, except the tax on banks checks, drafts, or orders, did not operate on contracts previously entered into. Foster v. Holley, 49 Ala. 593.

The repeal of the stamp acts removed the prohibition against recording unstamped deeds executed while they were in force. Hoffecker v. New Cass County Mut. Ins. Co. 5 Houst. (Del.) 101.

Leavitt v. Leavitt, 4 Me. 161, and Edeck v. Ranuer, 2 Johns. 423, held that the repeal by the act of 1802 of the act of July 6, 1797, did not obviate the objection under that act to the admission in evidence of an unstamped instrument executed while it was in force, unless the holder complied with a proviso of the repealing act by paying the proper stamp duty, and the prescribed penalty, and having the collector make an indorsement to that effect.

Rheinstrom v. Cone, 26 Wis. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 48, held that the provision of act of July 13, 1866, that no deed, instrument, document, writing, or paper required by law to be stamped, which has been signed or issued with a deficient stamp, or any copy thereof, shall be recorded or admitted or used as evidence in any court until a legal stamp or stamps denoting the amount of tax has been affixed thereto as prescribed by law, applied only to instruments executed or issued after that act took effect.

An unstamped written contract, executed after the act of July 1, 1862, went into effect, is not evidence of an existing contract between the parties, notwithstanding the provisions of the amendatory acts that such instrument shall not be deemed invalid and of no effect for want of such stamp, in view of the express provision of those acts that such an instrument cannot be admitted or used in evidence until a legal stamp shall have been affixed. McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 3 Pittsb. 1.

Gibson v. Hibbard, 13 Mich. 214, held that the provision of the act of 1864 for stamping instruments previously executed and thereby validating them was not unconstitutional as depriving one of property without due process of law.

Hoppock v. Stone, 49 Barb. 524, is to the same effect.

The effect of the various acts to limit the time for supplying the omission of the stamp is discussed under subdivision V. b.

IV. Effect of omission.

a. Generally.

The chief justice, who wrote the opinion in Patterson v. Gile, 1 Colo. 200, expressed his opinion that, notwithstanding the provision of the revenue act which purported to render instruments invalid and of no effect if the stamp was omitted with intent to evade the provisions of the act, such an instrument could not be regarded as void for want of a stamp, whatever the intent might have been, inasmuch as, under another provision of the act, every instrument not originally stamped might be perfectly stamped and invested with all its legal attributes. He said that an invalid instrument could not be validated by the simple act of a government officer affixing a stamp, and that, if an instrument be absolutely invalid and of no effect, it must remain so until it receives life at the hands of its author. He admitted that the legal status of an unstamped instrument was not easily defined, but said, so long as the law admitted it to be stamped it could not be regarded as a nullity.

Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47, held that the omission of a stamp merely rendered the instrument inadmissible, and did not invalidate it under a statute of Maryland, which provided that no instrument required to be stamped should be pleaded or given in evidence in any court of the state, or admitted in any such court to be available at law or in equity, or should be valid or available for any purpose whatsoever unless the same was stamped or marked as required by the act, and gave a remedy for curing the omission, after which the instrument was to be "as valid and available as if the same had been or were stamped or marked as by this act required." As shown by the opinion in that case, similar decisions had been made under the English statutes, which were substantially the same as the Maryland statute, in Rex v. Bishop, 1 Strange. 624; Hawkeswood's Case, 2 East, P. C. 955; Scott v. Jones, 4 Taunt. 865; Reg. v. Watts, 24 Eng. L. & Eq. 573; Delay v. Alcock, 29 Eng. L. & Eq. 83.

Satterthwaite v. Doughty, 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 314, 50 Am. Dec. 554, on the contrary, held that the Maryland statute passed upon in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47, supra, rendered the instrument void, and not simply inadmissible in evidence.

Carothers v. Covington (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 1040, held that an instrument otherwise legally executed would not be declared void because not written on stamped paper, unless there was some provision of the law that so declared.

Scott v. Jones, 4 Taunt. 865, held that trover might be maintained for an unstamped instrument, since it might upon payment of a penalty and stamp duty be rendered available.

b. Upon use of instrument as evidence.

1. As primary evidence.

So far as this question depends upon the applicability of the stamp laws to the state courts, it has been treated under subdivision I. a; and so far as it depends upon the intent characterizing the omission, it is treated under subdivisions II. a. and b.

A mere memorandum which does not, per se, have the binding effect of an agreement is admissible though not stamped, under the English statute. King v. St. Martin, 2 Ad. & El. 210.

A written instrument, though coming from the possession of the opposite party, cannot be given in evidence unless it is legally stamped. Doe ex dem. St. John v. Hore, 2 Esp. 724.

The act of July 6, 1807, provided that no instrument required to be stamped should be admitted in evidence in any court until stamped. That provision was enforced, and unstamped instruments excluded, by Leavitt v. Leavitt, 4 Me. 161; Edeck v. Ranuer, 2 Johns. 423; and Woodson v. Randolph, 1 Va. Cas. 128.

Under the later acts of 1862, 1864, 1865, and 1866, the provisions rendering unstamped instruments invalid or inadmissible in evidence have frequently been enforced, and unstamped instruments excluded, according to the terms of the acts.

2. Secondary and parol evidence; copies.

The cases applicable to the stamping of copies will be found under V. a, 2, infra.

The general rule that oral evidence cannot be substituted for any written contract applies, where the written contract is inadmissible in evidence because not stamped. Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Edwards, 46 Ala. 267; McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 3 Pittsb. 1.

Parol evidence of an unstamped agreement for the letting of a tenement at a certain rent, which has been lost, is inadmissible to prove the value of the tenement for purposes of the poor laws. King v. Castle Morton, 3 Barn. & Ald. 588.

Where an agreement is executed in duplicate, one draft being stamped and the other not, the latter is admissible as secondary evidence of the stamped draft. Waller v. Horsfall, 1 Campb. 501.

When two parts of an instrument are prepared, but only one is stamped, the party having the custody of the unstamped part may give secondary evidence of the contents of the agreement if the other party refuse on notice to produce the stamped part. Garnons v. Swift, 1 Taunt. 507.

In Munn v. Godbold, 3 Bing. 292, 11 J. R. Moore, 49, 2 Car. & P. 297, the plaintiff had lost his part of an agreement under seal after it had been duly stamped; the defendant upon notice produced his part unstamped, and the plaintiff the draft of the agreement. It was held that the defendant's part unstamped might be received in evidence.

The burden of proving that a lost instrument, a copy of which is offered in evidence, was unstamped, is upon the party objecting to the admission of the copy, in the absence of any evidence on the point; but the presumption of stamping is at an end, and the burden is shifted, when it appears that at a particular time the original was unstamped.

When an agreement requiring a stamp is lost, and was without a stamp when last seen, it will be taken that it never was stamped, and secondary evidence of it cannot be received. Arbon v. Fussell, 9 Jur. N. S. 753, 11 Week. Rep. 26.

Crowther v. Solomons, 6 C. B. 758, 18 L. J. C. P. N. S. 92, held that the presumption that a document was regularly stamped, arising from defendant's refusal after notice to produce the original at the trial, is overcome where the plaintiff, after producing an unstamped copy, admitted on cross-examination that the original was not stamped at the time it was executed and acted upon, and that the copy was properly rejected, it further appearing that the plaintiff's attorney had had inspection of the original shortly before the action.

In an action founded on a document in which both parties have an interest, and which is in the possession of one, but is said by him to have been lost, a judge cannot order that if such party does not produce the document to be stamped a copy duly stamped shall be read in evidence at the trial, and that the original shall not then be produced on the other side, nor objection be taken to the want of a stamp on the original. Rankin v. Hamilton, 15 Q. B. 187, 14 Jur. 930.

Pooley v. Goodwin, 4 Ad. & El. 94, 5 Nev. & M. 466, held that upon the production of secondary evidence of a lost order it would be presumed that the original was duly stamped, where such secondary evidence was furnished by a paper admitted by the adverse party's attorney.

to be a true copy of an affidavit sworn to by such adverse party.

In Rose v. Clarke, 1 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 534, the court refused to admit secondary evidence of a declaration of trust, there being strong circumstantial evidence that the original instrument was not stamped.

3. As collateral evidence.

There have been but few American decisions upon the question as to the admissibility of unstamped instruments for collateral purposes.

It has been held, however, that the fact that an instrument is not stamped as required by act of Congress does not render it inadmissible when it is not the foundation of the action but is offered simply as a written admission of the facts therein contained. Reis v. Hellman, 25 Ohio St. 180.

A note, though not admissible in evidence per se because not stamped, is admissible for the purpose of explaining the testimony of a witness in reference to the date of a settlement between the parties and the amount found due, where suit is brought upon the original consideration. Israel v. Redding, 40 Ill. 362.

The English courts have frequently passed upon the question, but it is difficult to derive from the cases any general principle by reference to which the apparently conflicting decisions may be reconciled.

The statute under which most of the English cases were decided went somewhat further than the American cases in describing the effect of the omission of the stamp upon the use of the instrument as evidence. It provided, in effect, that unstamped instruments which were required to be stamped should not be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be good, useful, or available in law or equity.

The act of 1891 provided, in effect, that unstamped instruments which are required to be stamped shall not, except in criminal proceedings, be given in evidence, or be available for any purpose.

Matheson v. Ross, 2 H. L. Cas. 286, held that a paper purporting to be a receipt, and as such requiring a stamp, but also purporting to be an agreed statement of accounts, which does not require a stamp, may be given in evidence to show the agreed state of accounts, although not stamped.

The opinion of the Lord Chancellor in that case, without attempting to reconcile all the previous decisions, drew from them a general principle in respect to receipts (which by analogy seem to be applicable to other classes of instruments) according to which an unstamped paper purporting to be a receipt is inadmissible, not only when the purpose and end are to prove a simple discharge from an existing debt, but also when the fact of payment is sought to be established, not for the purpose of showing a discharge as between debtor and creditor, but for another and collateral purpose: and is only admissible when the purpose relates to a matter, other than payment and discharge, which is also apparent from the paper, and in respect to which no stamp is necessary.

The opinion admits that it would be difficult to reconcile many of the previous cases, and makes no attempt to do so. How far they support the principle laid down may be judged from the following citations.

An unstamped receipt may be used by a witness who saw it given, to refresh his recollection as to the fact of the payment of the money. Rambert v. Cohen, 4 Esp. 213; Catt v. Howard, 3 Starkie, 3; Maugham v. Hubbard, 18 Barn. & C. 14, 2 Mann. & R. 5.

An unstamped acknowledgment in writing of the receipt of goods and cash is not admissible in evidence per se, but it is competent for the plaintiff to prove that upon calling over each article therein named to the defendant he had received the same, and the plaintiff may refresh his memory by referring to the account. Jacob v. Lindsay, 1 East, 460.

A receipt on the back of a note, which for want of a stamp is inadmissible, may be shown as the basis of a presumption that there was a principal sum in proportion due. Mauley v. Peel, 5 Esp. 120.

Lord Chancellor Cottenham held in Evans v. Prothero, 2 Macn. & G. 319, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 448, 15 Jur. 113, that a receipt for the purchase price of property, not admissible as such because not stamped, was not admissible for the purpose of proving an agreement for purchase of property.

The last case came before the Lord Chancellor, Lord St. Leonards, 1 De G. M. & G. 572, and he held, contrary to the decision of Lord Chancellor Cottenham, that the receipt was admissible as evidence of the contract of purchase.

An unstamped letter cannot be read as evidence of a contract, but that part of it which relates to a collateral matter may be read. Forsyth v. Jervis, 1 Starkie, 437.

Upon the trial of an issue of fact raising the question as to the delivery up of a guaranty, the surrender of which was the consideration for the agreement declared upon, the guaranty may be introduced in evidence, although unstamped. Haigh v. Brooks, 10 Ad. & El. 409, 4 Perry & D. 288.

An unstamped bill of exchange may be introduced in evidence by the plaintiff for the purpose of showing that it was unstamped, and thus negating payment of a debt by the delivery of the bill to him, where he has given in evidence in chief a document purporting that the defendant admitted the debt, but that it had been paid by a bill of exchange. Smart v. Nokes, 6 Mann. & G. 911, 7 Scott, N. R. 786, 13 L. J. C. P. N. S. 79, 8 Jur. 44.

Jardine v. Payne, 1 Barn. & Ad. 663, held that plaintiff, who sought to recover upon an account stated consisting of a letter admitting that the amount of a bill of exchange was due to the legal holder thereof, but not mentioning the plaintiff, could not, for the purpose of showing that he was such holder, introduce an unstamped bill of exchange indorsed to him.

In O'Keefe v. Roche, 2 Fox & S. 120, it was held that unstamped bills of exchange drawn by the plaintiff on third persons and given to the defendants, are inadmissible in support of a count for money had and received. This decision was upon the ground that the bills were essentially necessary proof of the cause of action, since there was not other legal evidence thereof. The court says that if it had been in plaintiff's power to prove by a witness of his own knowledge that a sum of money of the plaintiff's in the hands of the drawees in the draft had been paid by them to the defendants it would have been allowable for him to look at the bills in order to refresh his memory as to the precise amount.

An unsigned and unstamped draft of an agreement between a joint-stock company and one of its directors with reference to the occupation of the latter's house by the company is inadmissible in an action of debt for use and occupation for the purpose of showing that the occupation was to be by the other directors exclusively of himself, thereby removing the obstacle to recovery upon an implied contract. Chadwick v. Clarke, 1 C. B. 700.

It is not competent, for the purpose of showing that plaintiff held property under a certain rent, for a specified time to introduce unstamped papers tending to show that plaintiff, in years, prior to that in question, paid that rate of rent. Hawkins v. Warre, 3 Barn. & C. 600.

King v. Pendleton, 15 East, 449, held that although unstamped articles of agreement to work could not be received as evidence for the purpose of proving the agreement between the parties, yet that the court could look at it for the purpose of establishing when it ceased to operate in order to guide them in receiving parol evidence as to services rendered after the expiration of the period covered by the agreement from which it might presume a yearly contract.

In Vincent v. Cole, 3 Carr. & P. 481, Moody & N. 257, a building contractor sought to recover for extra work. The court held that it could not look at the unstamped contract to ascertain whether the work for which plaintiff sought to recover was included in it, and that the plaintiff was properly nonsuited.

An unstamped note is admissible for the purpose of proving the fact of bribery, in an action of debt under the statute against bribery at elections. Dover v. Maestaer, 5 Esp. 92.

Although an unstamped promissory note cannot be received in evidence as a security or to prove a loan of money, it may be looked at by the jury as a contemporary writing to prove or disprove the fraud imputed to the plaintiff, where the defendant claims that he had been made drunk by the plaintiff, and induced to write a note without receiving any money, and asserts that the note bears evidence that it was written by an intoxicated person. Gregory v. Fraser, 3 Campb. 454.

An unstamped bill of sale of goods which has been canceled is inadmissible for the purpose of showing that a second bill of sale was made in good faith. If it had tended to show fraud in the subsequent bill it might have been admitted at the instance of the party attacking the second bill, since a party may produce an unstamped instrument for the purpose of defeating it. Williams v. Gerry, 10 Mees. & W. 296, 2 Dowl. N. S. 201, 11 L. J. Exch. N. S. 389.

Assumpsit will not lie for necessities furnished to the defendant's apprentice, where the indenture of apprenticeship has not been legally stamped, since it is valid until stamped. Aldridge v. Ewen, 3 Esp. 189.

In Reynolds v. Hall, 1 Post. & F. 18, an action by assignees of a bankrupt, it was doubted whether an unstamped deed of assignment was admissible in evidence for plaintiff, as proving the act of bankruptcy; and, the point being doubtful, a copy was ultimately admitted by consent.

An unstamped agreement may be introduced to show changes in a prior agreement, and prevent recovery thereon. Reed v. Deere, 7 Barn. & C. 261, 2 Car. & P. 624.

It is error to permit the jury to regard an unstamped bill of exchange, and draw from it a conclusion that a previous bill had been canceled by it. Sweeting v. Halse, 9 Barn. & C. 865, 4 Mann. & R. 545. The court says that in Reed v. Deere, 7 Barn. & C. 261, 2 Car. & P. 624, the court looked at the second instrument to see whether it had the effect of varying the first. The distinction is evidently that in the former case the effectiveness of the unstamped instrument, per se, is not material, while in the latter case it is.

The failure of a party who receives a foreign bill in England to see that the adhesive stamp is canceled pursuant to stamp act 17 & 18 Vict. chap. 83, § 5, prevents him from maintaining an action against the person from whom he purchased the bill to recover back the price, it appearing that the drawer's name had been forged. The statute provides that no person who shall take or receive from any other person such bill upon which the stamp is not canceled, as required by the act, shall be entitled to recover thereon, or to make the same available for any purpose whatever. Pooley v. Brown, 11 C. B. N. S. 566, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 134, 8 Jur. N. S. 938, 5 L. T. N. S. 750, 10 Week. Rep. 345.

An unstamped agreement for letting a tenement at a certain rent is inadmissible to prove the value of the tenement in an action involving the tenant's settlement for the purpose of the poor laws.

But King v. St. Martin, 2 Ad. & El. 210, held that an unstamped entry containing the terms of renting signed by the pauper's wife, who had no authority to bind him, might be used to refresh the recollection of a witness called to prove the pauper's settlement.

c. Upon writs, processes, and orders of court.

Blake v. Hall, 19 La. Ann. 49, held that an appointment of an administrator was a nullity, where neither the bond, appraisal, nor letters of administration had stamps upon them as required by the revenue act. This decision seems to rest on the provision that it shall not be lawful to record any instrument, document, or paper required by law to be stamped, unless a stamp or stamps of the proper amount shall have been affixed, and the record of any such instrument upon which the proper stamp or stamps shall not have been affixed shall be utterly void and shall not be used in evidence.

Werbiskie v. McManus, 31 Tex. 116, is to the same effect.

German Liederkrantz v. Schlemann, 25 How. Pr. 388, held that the omission of the stamp required by act of July 1, 1862, rendered a summons invalid.

An original summons will be dismissed where the copy of the summons served was without any indication of a United States revenue stamp. Watson v. Morton, 26 How. Pr. 363.

Cole v. Bell, 48 Barb. 194, reversed a judgment for plaintiff because the summons issued by a justice of the peace, by which the action was commenced, was not stamped as required by the act of 1864.

Reddick v. White, 46 La. Ann. 1198, 15 So. 497, held, under a state stamp act, that the record on appeal must be stamped, and that the necessity of stamping could not be avoided by filing the record on appeal in forma pauperis.

Musselman v. Mank, 18 Iowa, 239, held that the superior court should have dismissed an appeal from the judge of probate because the instruments and papers by which the cause was transferred to that court were not stamped as required by the act of 1864.

So far as the question involved in this subdivision depends upon the applicability of the revenue laws to the state courts, it is treated under subdivision I. b. supra.

d. In Confederate states.

An instrument executed in Alabama in the year 1864 was not invalid because of the omission of the stamp required by the United States revenue laws, since no provision had been made for the enforcement of those laws in the Confederate states. McElvain v. Mudd, 44 Ala. 48, 4 Am. Rep. 106. The court in that case held that the instrument would have been admissible, even if no stamp had afterwards been affixed.

placed upon it pursuant to § 9 of the act of 1866, providing that in all cases where a party has not affixed the stamp required by law it shall be lawful for him or any person having an interest in the instrument to affix the proper stamp thereto prior to January 1, 1867.

Susong v. Williams, 1 Heisk. 625; Lewis v. Hearne, 34 Tex. 382; Van Alstyne v. Sorley, 32 Tex. 518, and Dailey v. Croker, 33 Tex. 815, 7 Am. Rep. 279, are to the same effect. They hold that the court will take judicial notice of the existence of the conditions referred to during the war of the Rebellion.

Blunt v. Dates, 40 Ala. 470, held that an attorney to whom a note was delivered for collection had such an interest therein as to authorize him to affix the stamps within the foregoing provision.

e. Miscellaneous.

If a written contract is invalid for want of a stamp, and for that reason not evidence of a contract, the plaintiff can recover upon the consideration of the note or promise for goods sold or delivered, or otherwise. Waterbury v. McMillan, 46 Miss. 635.

The payee of a promissory note having no revenue stamp affixed thereto, if for that reason invalid, may recover of the maker in an action of general assumpsit upon the original consideration for which the note was given. Wilson v. Carey, 40 Vt. 170.

If an agreement cannot be read in evidence for want of a stamp, the plaintiff cannot recover the value of the work and labor to which it relates, although the defendant may have had the benefit of it. Hughes v. Budd, 8 Dowl. P. C. 478.

In Stephens v. Pinney, 8 Taunt. 327, 2 J. B. Moore, 349, the plaintiff in an action on the common counts for work and labor had established his case without its appearing that there was an agreement in writing regulating the price and terms of the work. It was held that the defendant could not defeat the action by proving the existence of an unstamped written agreement with reference to the work. The opinion says that if it had appeared as part of the plaintiff's case that there was an agreement in writing with reference to the work he must have produced it, and when produced it could not have been received in evidence because unstamped, and he must then have been nonsuited.

Plaintiff in an action for the price of goods supplied under a written contract, which refers for the term of payment therein said to have been made between the defendant and a third person, cannot recover where it appears by his own evidence that the arrangement was itself in writing, and cannot be produced in proof for want of a stamp. Alcock v. Delay, 4 El. & Bl. 660.

Lambert v. Whitlock, 29 Ind. 26, held that it was not defense to a suit for the purchase price of land that the grantor had caused the consideration to be stated in the deed at a less sum than the true amount for the purpose of defrauding the government. This decision rests upon the ground that the deed is not invalid for all purposes, notwithstanding the provision of the 9th section of the act of 1866, that an unstamped deed shall be invalid and of no effect, since the grantee may sell and convey a full and perfect title, under the provision that the title of a purchaser of land by deed duly stamped shall not be defeated or affected by the want of a proper stamp on any deed conveying the land by any person from, through, or under whom his grantor claims or holds title.

The want of a stamp on a note does not put the indorsee upon inquiry. Burson v. Huntington, 21 Mich. 415, 4 Am. Rep. 497.

The internal revenue act in force January 4, 1871, merely made the inadvertent omission of a stamp a disqualification which prevented the use of the instrument as evidence until the delinquent had paid his tax, and did not, in the case of a negotiable promissory note rebut the presumption that an indorsee paid value for it. Long v. Spencer, 78 Pa. 303.

Jones v. Pease, 21 Wis. 645, held that the omission, without intent to evade the revenue acts, or stamps from deeds exchanged between parties to a parol agreement for the exchange of lands did not render them insufficient to take the agreement out of the statute of frauds as to a part of the land not covered by the deeds, in view of the remedies provided for curing the omission.

V. Subsequent stamping.

a. What remedy available.

1. By party or collector.

The act of March 3, 1863, § 16, provided, in effect, that no instrument signed or issued before the 1st day of June, 1863, without being duly stamped, should, for that cause, be deemed invalid and of no effect; provided that no instrument, required to be stamped, signed, or issued without being stamped, should be admitted in evidence until stamped, and that the person desiring to use any such instrument might stamp the same in the presence of the court.

It was held that under this statute a note issued prior to June 1, 1863, without being stamped, might be stamped by the holder at any time, either before suit brought or afterwards; and that the provision as to appearing in the presence of the court was made out of abundant caution to guard against suspense, inconvenience, or hardship. Day v. Baker, 36 Mo. 125.

Cooke v. England, 27 Md. 14, 92 Am. Dec. 618, held that the mere authority to stamp in the presence of the court, under the acts prior to the act of 1863, did not exclude stamping at other places. In that case the stamping was done by the collector pursuant to the act of 1863, passed pending the action.

Wright v. McFadden, 25 Ind. 483, held that a party had a right to affix a stamp to an affidavit without leave of court, upon an objection made while act of June 30, 1864, was in force in view of § 163, providing that no instrument or paper made prior to the passage of the act without being duly stamped shall for that cause, if the stamp shall be subsequently affixed, be deemed invalid and of no effect.

Section 16 of the act of June 30, 1864, provided for stamping, in the presence of the court, instruments not originally stamped, which had been signed or issued before the act. The act of March 3, 1863, by an amendment to § 158 of the act of 1864 (the section which provided that unstamped instruments should be invalid and of no effect), provided for the affixing of the omitted stamp by the collector.

It was held by Dorris v. Grace, 24 Ark. 326, that the act of 1865 did not, in the case of an inadvertent omission, exclude the remedy given by the act of 1864, but merely gave an additional remedy.

Tobey v. Chipman, 13 Allen, 123, also held that the remedy given by the later act did not exclude that given by the earlier in case of an inadvertent omission. These decisions seem to rest upon the ground that the new remedy was given by an act which purported to amend § 158 of the act of 1864, and did not purport to amend or repeal § 163 of that act, which provided for affixing the stamp in the presence of the court. They seem to imply that the remedy provided by the act of 1865 was exclusive of the remedy under the act of 1864, when the omission was with intent to evade the act. Garland v. Lane, 46 N. H. 245, however, held that the remedy given by the act of 1865 only applied to instruments made under the act of 1864, and therefore did not affect the remedy given by that act, which, by its terms, only applied to instruments made or issued before its passage.

Patterson v. Eames, 54 Me. 203, and Carpen-ter v. Johnson, 1 Nev. 331, held that instruments executed before the act of 1864 might be stamped in the presence of the court. These decisions rest upon a provision of § 163 of the act of 1864, and make no reference to the act of 1865, which apparently was not in force at the time of the trial.

An instrument made in 1863, from which the stamp was originally omitted, can only be stamped since the 1st day of January, 1867, by the revenue collector of the proper district. Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Edwards, 46 Ala. 267.

Waterbury v. McMillan, 46 Miss. 635, held, with reference to a contract executed while the act of 1863 was in force, that in the absence of fraud in omitting the stamp originally it might be stamped at the trial, and introduced in evidence.

Beebe v. Hutton, 47 Barb. 187, expressed an opinion to the same effect, although it did not authoritatively so hold.

It is not apparent, however, with reference to instruments which, like those involved in the latter two cases, were executed after the act of 1864, and before the act of 1866, went into effect, that any stamping at all was required by the stamp acts in order to render them admissible in evidence, unless the original omission was fraudulent, and the instrument therefore invalid. As already observed, the provision of § 163 of the act of 1864, excluding unstamped instruments from evidence, only applied to instruments previously executed, and the act of 1865 did not contain any provision excluding unstamped instruments from evidence. This view of the statute has the support of Govern v. Littlefield, 13 Allen, 127, note; and Rheinstrom v. Cone, 26 Wis. 163, 7 Am. Rep. 48.

It may be that the court considered that inasmuch as the stamp duty had not been paid it should require the stamps to be affixed independently of any such requirement in the stamp acts. Whigham v. Pickett, 43 Ala. 140, however, apparently considered that it was necessary to stamp such instruments, although the omission was not fraudulent; and it held contrary to Waterbury v. McMillan, 46 Miss. 635, supra, and Beebe v. Hutton, 47 Barb. 187, supra, that the remedy provided by the act of 1865 was exclusive as to instruments executed after the act of 1864 went into effect.

Davy v. Morgan, 56 Barb. 218, expressed a similar opinion with reference to such instruments, although the omission was not fraudulent, but did not decide the question.

Boly v. Lake, 54 Mo. 202, held that the stamp might be affixed in court; but it does not appear when the contract in question was executed, nor whether the original omission was fraudulent.

The act of July 13, 1866, amended § 163 of the act of July 30, 1864, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and substituting a provision to the effect that "thereafter" no instrument required by law to be stamped, which has been signed or issued without being stamped, shall be recorded or admitted or used in evidence until a stamp shall have been affixed thereto "as prescribed by law." The act also provided for affixing stamps before the collector, and for the remission of the penalty by him when the omission was inadvertent.

Corrie v. Billiu, 23 La. Ann. 250, held that the remedy provided was exclusive as to instruments to which it applied, and such instruments could not be stamped in the presence of the court. It does not appear whether the original omission was fraudulent or not.

Bernard's Succession, 24 La. Ann. 402, is to the same effect.

But in Chaffe v. Ludelling, 27 La. Ann. 807, the court said, in reply to an objection that the document sued on (which was dated after the act of 1866 went into effect) should not have been received in evidence because not properly stamped when issued, that it was stamped when offered in evidence, and that that was sufficient. It does not appear whether the stamping referred to was before the collector or not.

Foster v. Holley, 49 Ala. 593, held that the remedy by stamping before the collector under the act of 1866 did not preclude stamping in the presence of the court if the instrument was not void because of the original omission.

The provision of the act of June 23, 1874, for stamping before the court or clerk, was not exclusive of the remedy by stamping before the collector. Cresson v. Phillips, 6 W. N. C. 448.

The power of the court to allow an amendment of a defective bond or other security cannot be exercised to aid an appellant who has omitted the stamp required by the act of Congress from his appeal papers. Hugus v. Strickler, 19 Iowa, 413; Botkins v. Spurgeon, 20 Iowa, 399.

O'Hare v. Leonard, 19 Iowa, 515, held that the court could not, by virtue of its power to permit amendments on appeal, permit a notice of appeal to be stamped after the appeal was otherwise perfected.

Coppernoll v. Ketcham, 56 Barb. 111, however, held that the requirement of the act of 1865 that the stamp should be affixed by the collector did not deprive the state court of power, under the local code, to permit the stamp to be affixed to a notice of appeal.

State v. Way, 15 Iowa, 596, held that the defendant's objection to the transcript on appeal, on the ground that no stamp was affixed to the clerk's certificate as required by the revenue law, was obviated by the attorney general's affixing a stamp.

Stolte v. Herndon, 32 Tex. 392, held that the court would take judicial notice that the office of revenue collector was not in practical operation in Texas in 1865, and that therefore an instrument executed in Texas during that year might be stamped by any party to it prior to January 1, 1867, pursuant to the act of 1866.

2. Stamping copies.

A substantial copy, or such a draft of the instrument as will identify the subject of the tax, can be used to enable a party to avail himself of the remedial benefit of the act of 1874, providing for stamping instruments, or, if the originals have been lost, copies thereof, before the judge or clerk of a court of record. Miller v. Wentworth, 82 Pa. 280.

Where one part of the document has been lost the court will compel the party holding the other part, or his attorney, if he holds it, to produce it at the stamp office for the purpose of having it stamped, though it is not held on any trust for the party applying. Neal v. Swind, 2 Cramp. & J. 378, 2 Tyrw. 464.

In Bousfield v. Godfrey, 5 Bliz. 418, 2 Moore & P. 771, the defendant had surreptitiously obtained possession of an unstamped agreement executed by plaintiff and himself, thereby preventing plaintiff from affixing a stamp, as he had intended, within the twenty-one days after execution allowed by the statute. The court ordered defendant to turn over a copy of the agreement to plaintiff, and then ordered that if plaintiff should, upon the trial of the cause, produce the copy of the agreement duly stamped, the defendant should not be permitted at the trial to produce the original.

The court will compel the production by a defendant of an unstamped agreement in his custody to which the plaintiffs claim to be the parties in interest, although they are not parties to the instrument, in order that they may get it stamped. Bateman v. Phillips, 4 Taunt. 157.

In Travis v. Collins, 2 Cramp. & J. 625, 2 Tyrw. 728, the court refused to compel a tenant to produce his part of the renting agreement which was executed in duplicate, to be stamped at the instance of a purchaser of the premises who had not applied to the vendor, or made proper effort to find him.

b. Time.

A party who appealed to the district court without affixing a revenue stamp to any of the papers or transcripts constituting the appeal was permitted, after the adverse party had moved to strike the cause from the files, to amend and have the stamps affixed by a deputy collector. Deakin v. Graham, 19 Iowa, 553.

A stamp may be supplied, even after verdict. Janvrin v. Fogg, 49 N. H. 346.

A stamp may be affixed to a notice of appeal after motion to dismiss. Killip v. Empire Mill Co. 2 Nev. 34.

Holyoke Machine Co. v. Franklin Paper Co. 97 Mass. 150, held that the stamping of an agreement for submission to arbitration after the award was sufficient.

Browne v. Steck, 2 Colo. 70, held that the amendment of the act of 1866 so as to require an instrument to be presented to the collector for stamping, and remission of penalty within twelve months from August 1, 1871, instead of twelve months from August 1, 1866, as originally provided, was intended to cover the period between those dates, and that therefore the collector had authority to remit the penalty on a note presented to him in February, 1871.

Gay v. Comstock, 2 W. N. C. 532, held that the stamping of a draft on January 1, 1873, by the collector, was authorized, and rendered it admissible in evidence, notwithstanding an objection based on the act of June 6, 1872, providing that up to October 1, 1872, the holders of any instrument of writing not duly stamped might, upon application to the collector of internal revenue, have the same stamped according to the provisions of law then in force. The court held that as the instrument was a draft it was not within the repealing act.

Cresson v. Phillips, 6 W. N. C. 448, held, in effect, that the act of June 23, 1874, providing for stamping before the court or clerk, did not repeal § 2432, U. S. Rev. Stat., or prevent the stamping of an instrument before the collector after the expiration of the period accorded by the act of 1874, and the amendatory act of February 25, 1870, viz., January 1, 1877.

Whigham v. Pickett, 43 Ala. 140, after holding that the court below erred in permitting plaintiff to affix a stamp in the presence of the court, reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause to give plaintiff an opportunity to have the stamps affixed by the collector.

Hurton v. Kirkby, 7 Taunt. 174, 2 Marsh. 480, held that the objection that the warrant of attorney on which a judgment was entered was not sufficiently stamped, was cured by procuring it to be properly stamped after a rule nisi to set the judgment aside.

c. Application to collector.

1. Who may apply.

Myers v. Smith, 48 Barb. 614, held that under the act of 1865 the party who issued the paper was the one to appear before the collector and procure the stamping, and that the other party could not cure the omission by appearing before the collector and procuring the stamp to be affixed.

Schermerhorn v. Burgess, 55 Barb. 422, however, dissented from that view, and held that the application could be made, not only by the person executing the instrument, but by any person having an interest therein.

2. To what district.

When the application to the collector is not by the maker of the instrument, but by another party having an interest therein as payee or holder, the application should be made in the district in which the party making it resides, although the maker may reside in another district. Schermerhorn v. Burgess, 55 Barb. 422.

3. Power of deputy collector.

Deakin v. Graham, 19 Iowa, 553, held that the deputy collector had power to stamp unstamped instruments executed without any intent to defraud the United States of the stamp duty, under the provision of the revenue act in force in 1865, to the effect that in case of sickness or temporary disability of a collector the duties might devolve upon one of the deputies; and further held that in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary the disability of the collector would be presumed.

Brown v. Crandal, 23 Iowa, 112, McAafferty v. Hale, 24 Iowa, 355, and Muscattine v. Sterne-man, 30 Iowa, 526, 6 Am. Rep. 685, however, held that a deputy collector, by virtue of his ordinary duties as such, had no power to remit penalties, and to stamp or to authorize the stamping of instruments when they were left unstamped from inadvertence or mistake, except when, from inability or sickness of the collector, he acted by special authority in his place; and further, that such special authority could not be presumed, and the deputy's act must be held a nullity, unless it was authenticated by the collector's seal, or there was evidence allegando to show the sickness or disability of the collector.

4. Miscellaneous.

The omission of a stamp in good faith, the parties believing none is required, is an inadvertence within the act of Congress, § 158, compilation of 1867, providing that if it appears to the collector that the omission of the stamp was by inadvertence he may affix the proper stamp and remit the penalty. Green Mountain Central Inst. v. Britain, 44 Vt. 13.

The collector's certificate that there is satisfactory evidence that the omission was inadvertent is conclusive. Hoppock v. Stone, 40 Barb. 324; Corry Nat. Bank v. Rouse, 3 Pittsb. 18.

When the proper revenue officer stamps an instrument, and certifies thereto, he will be presumed to have affixed the amount of stamps required by law. Frazer v. Robinson, 42 Miss. 121; Green Mountain Cent. Institute v. Britain, 44 Vt. 13.

The court will take judicial notice of the receipt or acknowledgement indorsed on a deed by the collector or deputy collector of internal revenue. Lerch v. Snyder, 112 Pa. 161, 4 Atl. 336.

An instrument will be received in evidence when the collector's receipt for the price of the stamps and the penalty is produced, although he did not actually affix and cancel the stamp as he should have done. Ibid.

d. What stamps required.

It has been held in England that it is sufficient if the stamps required by the act in force at the time of the subsequent stamping are affixed, although the duty is less than at the time the instrument was executed. Deakin v. Pennall, 2 Exch. 320; Buckworth v. Simpson, 1 Cramp. M. & R. 833; Doe ex dem. Dyke v. Whittingham, 4 Taunt. 20.

Clarke v. Roche, 47 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 147, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 170, 37 L. T. N. S. 633, 26 Week. Rep. 112, however, holds that before a deed can be admitted in evidence, it must be proved that it is duly stamped, not only at the time of its production, but also in accordance with the law in force when it was first executed.

e. Effect.

An instrument when stamped as prescribed by the act of 1864 in the presence of the court is valid from its date. Dorris v. Grace, 24 Ark. 326; Gibson v. Hibbard, 13 Mich. 214; Corry Nat. Bank v. Rouse, 3 Pittsb. 18.

The subsequent stamping, pursuant to statute, of an agreement for submission to arbitration, renders it valid as if it had been stamped when made, in the absence of fraud, and validates an award made under the agreement in the meantime. Holyoke Mach. Co. v. Franklin Paper Co. 97 Mass. 150.

A deed which has been stamped by the collector pursuant to act of 1865 must, as between the parties, be treated as if it had been stamped at the time of its execution. Tripp v. Bishop, 56 Pa. 424.

The stamping of an instrument by a collector or of the proper district, under the authority given him by the act of March 3, 1865, within twelve months from the time the same was executed, removes objection to its admission in evidence based on the original failure to stamp. Knox v. Huldekoper, 21 Wis. 528.

Stamping by the collector under the act of 1866 gives a note all the validity and competency as an instrument of evidence that it could have if it had been properly stamped as soon as it was made. Hence the note is admissible, although stamped after the date of the writ. Aldrich v. Hagan, 50 N. H. 60.

The stamping of an instrument by the collector pursuant to the internal revenue act relieves the court from the necessity of considering the question of the validity of the instrument because of the omission of the stamp at the time of its execution. Logan v. Dils, 4 W. Va. 397.

The subsequent stamping of the probate of a will under the English statute relates back, so as to support a commission of bankruptcy sued out by the executor upon a debt due him as such. Rogers v. James, 2 Marsh. 425.

Doud v. Wright, 22 Iowa, 336, held that the omission to affix a stamp to the appeal bond at the time of the taking of an appeal from a justice's court was not a sufficient cause for the dismissal of the appeal, where, before trial, the proper stamp was affixed with permission and under the order of the revenue collector.

Subsequently affixing a stamp to the probate of a will makes the executor's title perfect by relation as of the time of the testator's death. Rogers v. James, 7 Taunt. 147, 2 Marsh. 425.

The subsequent stamping of a note pursuant to the act of 1866, in an amount sufficient to validate both it and the mortgage securing it operated to validate the record of the mortgage as soon as the fact was noted on the margin of the record. Stewart v. Hopkins, 30 Ohio St. 502.

Section 9 of chapter 184 of the act of 1866, which provided for stamping before the collector, and enacted that when so stamped the instrument should be deemed valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped when made or issued, and provided for making a new record when the instrument had been originally recorded, contained proviso to the effect that no right acquired in good faith before the stamping of the instrument or copy thereof and the recording thereof, as provided in the section, if such record be required by law, should be affected by the statute.

Vail v. Knapp, 49 Barb. 290, upheld the validity of a chattel mortgage, stamped before the collector pursuant to the act of 1866, as against an attachment levied after the execution and filing of the mortgage but before the stamping. The decision rests upon the ground that the mortgage was not invalid for want of the stamps, since the omission was inadvertent, and that the proviso contemplates only instruments which are required to be recorded, and that chattel mortgages were required to be filed, but not to be recorded.

Hopcock v. Stone, 49 Barb. 524, held that the stamping of a chattel mortgage pursuant to the act of 1866 validated the same against an assignee for creditors claiming under an assignment executed in the interval between the execution and stamping of the mortgage, the original omission not having been with intent to evade the revenue laws. The opinion said that the maker of the mortgage, upon whom the duty of providing the stamp properly rested, could have no moral right to deny the force of his obligation by reason of the penal effect of the revenue laws, when the mortgagee inadvertently received the mortgage unstamped without any intent to evade the act; and that the assignee had parted with no consideration, and stood in no better position than his assignor. It was not admitted, however, that a purchaser for a valuable consideration would have been in any better position.

Sawyer v. Parker, 57 Me. 39, held that the chattel mortgage insufficiently stamped and recorded was valid as against an attaching creditor who seized the goods before the mortgage was restamped by the collector and the record corrected, there being no evidence that the omission to properly stamp the mortgage was the result of an intent to evade the statute. The opinion said the mortgage was valid without the stamps, and that the last clause of the act of 1866, to the effect that no right acquired in good faith before the stamping of such instrument or copy thereof and the recording thereof as therein provided, if record be required by law, should in any manner be affected by such stamping as aforesaid, related to the stamping of the instrument by the collector, and did not render an unstamped instrument invalid when there was no attempt to evade the act of Congress.

McBride v. Doty, 23 Iowa, 122, held that under § 152 of the internal revenue act the record of a chattel mortgage insufficiently stamped was not constructive notice to third parties, and that stamping before the collector pursuant to the act of 1866 did not cure the defect so as to interfere with intervening rights, although the omission was inadvertent.

Wilson v. Reuter, 29 Iowa, 176, however, held that stamping before the collector rendered a mortgage valid as against intervening purchasers having actual notice of the mortgage, where the mortgage was not invalid because of the omission of the stamp, distinguishing McBride v. Doty, 23 Iowa, 122, on the ground that the parties claiming adversely to the mortgage in that case had no actual knowledge of its existence.

Miller v. Morrow, 3 Coldw. 587, held that the stamping of a deed before the collector, and the registering thereof pursuant to the act of 1866, did not validate the deed as against an intervening attachment in view of § 152 of the act of 1864, making it unlawful to record any instrument not properly stamped, and of the proviso of the act of 1866 already recited.

In Hetzell v. Gregory, 7 Phila. 148, a judgment had been entered upon a judgment note which was insufficiently stamped, and execution had been issued thereon. The judgment and execution were afterwards set aside by the court, and the judgment debtor then confessed judgment to another creditor and caused an execution to issue thereon without the latter's knowledge. The first judgment creditor then procured the collector to stamp the note and then another judgment was entered and another execution issued. The court then rescinded the order setting aside the first judgment, and the sheriff returned that he had sold the property under the three executions. The court held that the first judgment creditor was entitled to the proceeds of the sale under his first execution. This decision was based upon the language of the act of July 13, 1866, providing that after the instrument is stamped by the collector it shall be deemed and held to be as valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped when made or issued. The court said that there were no intervening rights which required to be protected, since the entry of the second judgment and issue of the execution thereon were the acts of the judgment debtor who was at fault in failing to affix the stamp to the note in the first instance.

VI. Pleading and practice.

a. Raising objection by demurrer.

It was generally held, under the acts of 1864, 1865, and 1866, that the objection founded on the failure to stamp could not be taken by demurrer. Campbell v. Wilcox, 10 Wall. 421, 19 L. ed. 973; Miller v. Henderson, 24 Ark. 344; Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 167; Trull v. Moulton, 12 Allen, 896; Cabbott v. Radford, 17 Minn. 320, Gil. 296; Jones v. Davis, 22 Wis. 421.

That doctrine naturally followed from the doctrine already alluded to, that an intent to evade the revenue laws was necessary to invalidate an instrument for want of a stamp.

Campbell v. Wilcox, 10 Wall. 421, 19 L. ed. 973, rests its decision on that ground, although it also holds that the averment that defendant made and delivered the note would imply that it was stamped, if that were necessary to its validity.

The decision in Jones v. Davis, 22 Wis. 421, rests upon the latter ground.

Berry v. Boyd, 28 Iowa, 410, held that an answer in replevin was demurrable because it showed that the chattel mortgage upon which defendant relied was not stamped. It is to be observed, however, that at the time of this decision the Iowa courts held, contrary to the weight of authority, that a fraudulent intent was not necessary to invalidate the instrument.

Dornenhower v. Stevens, 44 W. N. C. 264, holds, in effect, that a statement setting out at length notes executed since the revenue act of 1898 went into effect, but not showing that they had been stamped according to law, is demurrable. There is no written opinion, but the argument of defendant's counsel seems to have been that the notes as set out in the statement did not appear to be stamped, and therefore could not have been received in evidence.

Armendiaz v. Serna, 40 Tex. 201, holds that the objection that the omission of a stamp from an instrument executed and issued in another country rendered it invalid under the laws of that country cannot be taken by demurrer to a petition which either does not aver the foreign laws, or avers them to be such as not to render the instrument invalid.

b. Necessity and sufficiency of averments as to omission.

The objection to the admissibility of an instrument because not stamped is not one which it is necessary to show in pleading. Fleld v. Woods, 7 Ad. & El. 114, 2 Nev. & P. 117, 6 Dowl. P. C. 23, 8 Car. & P. 52.

Whitehill v. Shickle, 43 Mo. 537, held that the objection that the instrument used was not stamped must be based on the pleadings, and cannot be raised for the first time upon an objection to the evidence.

Campbell v. Wilcox, 10 Wall. 421, 19 L. ed. 973, supra, however, said, arguendo, that the objection could be set up by special plea, or urged on the trial; and it seems to have been the general practice to raise the question by an objection to the instrument when offered in evidence.

The defense that a bill of exchange was written on paper improperly stamped with an old die is admissible under the plea of nonacceptance. Dawson v. Macdonald, 2 Mees. & W. 26, 2 Gale, 215.

c. Who may raise or waive objection.

A party who prevents a deed from being stamped ought not to be heard to object to its admission in evidence. Alexander v. Leith, 39 Ga. 180.

The maker of the note inadequately stamped cannot take advantage of his own wrong or default by objecting to its being received in evidence. Jacquín v. Warren, 40 Ill. 459.

A party who gives an obligation without being stamped, when the law requires stamps to be placed thereon, is a wrongdoer, and can draw no protection from his omission. Chaffe v. Ludelling, 27 La. Ann. 607.

Neither the principal nor the sureties in a voluntary bond can allege his neglect to affix the stamp in avoidance thereof. McGovern v. Hoesback, 53 Pa. 176.

The maker of a note is not entitled to the reversal of a judgment thereon because of his failure to stamp the note as required by law. Mogelin v. Westhoff, 33 Tex. 788. It does not appear whether the objection was made for the first time on appeal or not.

The court cannot sanction an agreement between the parties that an objection for want of a proper stamp shall be waived, and if the objection comes to the knowledge of the court no decree will be made until the instrument, duly stamped, is produced to the registrar. Cowen v. Thomas, 3 Myl. & K. 353.

d. Time of raising objection.

The objection to an unstamped instrument must be made when it is offered, and otherwise will not be considered. Mortee v. Edwards, 20 La. Ann. 236; Robinson v. Vernon, 7 C. B. N. S. 231; Fleld v. Woods, 7 Ad. & El. 114. The objection that the instrument is not stamped must be raised when it is offered, and cannot be urged for the first time by a request for an instruction to the jury to disregard the instrument. Thomson v. Wilson, 26 Iowa, 121.

It is too late to object for the first time to the admission of an unstamped instrument when the report of a referee comes up for confirmation. Jones's Appeal, 62 Pa. 324.

An objection that an instrument is not stamped as required by the revenue laws cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. Andrews v. Poe, 30 Md. 485; Hawkins v. Wilson, 1 W. Va. 117.

The objection to the admission of an instrument because not sufficiently stamped must be decided by the judge at nisi prius, and cannot properly be reserved for the opinion of the appellate court. Stordet v. Kuczynski, 17 C. B. 251, 25 L. J. C. P. N. S. 2.

The omission of a stamp from a notice of appeal cannot be urged on the argument of the appeal, but can only arise on a motion to dismiss the appeal. Cole v. Bell, 48 Barb. 194.

The objection that a summons issued from a justice's court is invalid because of the omission of a revenue stamp should be made before the justice on the return day, and it is too late to raise the objection for the first time on appeal, since the plaintiff has lost his opportunity to supply the stamp, and to negative the attempt to evade the statute. Baird v. Pridmore, 31 How. Pr. 359.

Miller v. Larmon, 38 How. Pr. 417, held that the objection that the return of a constable to the service of a summons was not stamped as required by the act of March 24, 1867, might be raised for the first time on appeal from a judgment for plaintiff entered without the defendant's appearance. The court distinguishes the case from Baird v. Pridmore, 31 How. Pr. 359, upon the ground that in that case the summons served upon the defendant was unstamped.

Where judgment has been suffered by default on a note, and a writ of inquiry is executed, it cannot be objected on the execution of the writ that the note has no stamp, or an improper stamp. Watson v. Glover, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 184, 7 Jur. 68.

e. Questions of fact; presumptions generally.

The question as to presumption with reference to intent is treated under subdivision II. b.

An instrument bearing the proper stamps, when introduced in evidence, will be presumed to have been stamped by the proper party and at the proper time. Iowa & M. R. Co. v. Perkins, 28 Iowa, 281; Union Agri. & Stock Assn. v. Nellis, 31 Iowa, 95.

In the absence of proof to the contrary, the court, when a certified copy of a mortgage is offered in evidence, will presume that the recorder did his duty, and required the necessary stamps to be legally affixed before registering the mortgage. Grand v. Cox, 24 La. Ann. 462.

The objection by defendant that the stamp appearing on the bond when introduced in evidence was placed thereon without his knowledge, consent, or authority is properly overruled where defendant merely offered to show that the bond was not stamped at the time of its execution. The court, without proof to the contrary, will presume that the stamp was properly and legally placed on the bond. Myers v. McGraw, 5 W. Va. 30.

The burden of showing that a deed otherwise regular has not been duly stamped lies on the party impeaching it, and if the deed purports to have been signed and delivered, "being first duly stamped," but the stamp is obliterated, and it only appears by marks on the deed that some stamp was once impressed, the judge may decide whether or not the fact of stamping is sufficiently proved, and if satisfied of it receive the instrument in evidence. Doe vs. dem. Fryer v. Coombs, 3 Q. B. 927.

The court should admit a deed not bearing a stamp when offered, and submit to the jury the question of fact under the evidence whether the deed was originally stamped or not as required by law. Alexander v. Leith, 39 Ga. 180.

Platt v. Broach, 36 How. Pr. 188, held that the question when and by whom the stamp appearing on a note when introduced in evidence was affixed, should have been submitted to the jury, it appearing that the note was not stamped at the time it was executed and left the maker's hands.

L. Stamp not part of instrument.

The revenue stamp is not part of the instrument, and the fact that what appears to be a copy of the instrument in the paper book or settled case as appeared does not show that the instrument was stamped, is immaterial. Hallock v. Jaudin, 34 Cal. 167; Trull v. Moulton, 12 Allen, 396; Cabbott v. Radford, 17 Minn. 320, Gil. 296; Owsley v. Greenwood, 18 Minn. 429, Gil. 386; Kiefer v. Rogers, 19 Minn. 32, Gil. 14.

VII. Failure to cancel; defective cancellation.

It was held, under the acts passed between 1862 and 1866, inclusive, that the failure to conform to the prescribed mode did not render the instrument inadmissible. Foster v. Holley, 49 Ala. 593; D'Armond v. Dubose, 22 La. Ann. 131, 2 Am. Rep. 718.

At least if it was not fraudulent. Desmond v. Norria, 10 Allen, 250; Union Agri. & Stock Assn. v. Neill, 31 Iowa, 95.

In Andrew v. Thomas, 6 W. N. C. 414, however, the court of common pleas rendered a judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto upon the reserved point whether a note offered in evidence by plaintiff was admissible when the revenue stamp was canceled merely by the impress of a rubber stamp with the date July 6, 1869, without any initial or other device.

It was also held that the entire failure to cancel did not invalidate the instrument. Patterson v. Gile, 1 Colo. 200; Adams v. Dale, 20 Ind. 273; Goodwine v. Wanda, 25 Ind. 101; Union Agri. & Stock Assn. v. Neill, 31 Iowa, 95; Corry Nat. Bank v. Rouse, 3 Pittsb. 18; Chaplin v. Horton, 36 Vt. 684.

Schultz v. Herndon, 32 Tex. 390, held that if there be a legal stamp upon the instrument, whether canceled or not, it is sufficient to entitle a party to use it in evidence in the state courts whatever might be its condition under like circumstances in the Federal courts.

Jacobs v. Cunningham, 32 Tex. 774, also held that the failure to cancel a stamp did not render the instrument inadmissible.

The revenue stamp is sufficiently canceled when it is so defaced that it can never be legally used again. Taylor v. Duncan, 33 Tex. 440.

The provision of act of 1866, chap. 184, § 9, that where an instrument was executed at a time when and place where no collection district was established, a stamp may be affixed to it by any party having an interest therein at any time prior to the first of January, 1867, does not make the cancellation of the stamp necessary. Blunt v. Bates, 40 Ala. 470.

Rees v. Jackson, 64 Pa. 487, 3 Am. Rep. 608, held that it was a question for the jury whether the maker of a note had canceled three of the seven stamps on the note, all of which bore his initials, it having been proved that the initials on the other four were made by him.

VIII. Foreign laws.

In considering the question as to the enforceability of the provisions of foreign statutes with reference to unstamped instruments, it would seem that a distinction should be observed between those provisions which merely affect the remedy by excluding unstamped instruments from evidence, and those which render unstamped instruments invalid. This distinction is made by Alderson, B., in Bristow v. Sequeville, 5 Exch. 275, 3 Car. & K. 64, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 289, 14 Jur. 674, which held that an unstamped receipt dated in a foreign country was admissible notwithstanding that under the laws of that country it would be inadmissible until stamped upon payment of a penalty. He said: "It is very different whether the law makes a stamp necessary to the validity of an instrument, or to its admissibility in evidence. . . . If by the law of a foreign country a document is only inadmissible for want of a stamp it is a valid contract and receivable in evidence in another country."

And in Clegg v. Levy, 3 Campb. 166, and Alves v. Hodgson, 2 Esp. 528, 7 T. R. 241, it was expressly held that if a stamp is necessary under a foreign law to render an instrument valid it cannot be received without being stamped.

In James v. Catherwood, 3 Dowl. & R. 190, the chief justice said: "It would be productive of prodigious inconvenience, if in every case in which an instrument was executed in a foreign country we were to receive in evidence what the law of that country was, in order to ascertain whether the instrument was or was not valid." As pointed out in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47, however, it did not appear in that case, and was not alleged, that the instrument was void under the law of the foreign country for want of a stamp. And Pollock, C. R., in Bristow v. De Sequeville, 5 Exch. 275, 3 Car. & K. 64, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 289, 14 Jur. 674, said with reference to the statement of Alderson, B. before alluded to, that the case of James v. Catherwood, 3 Dowl. & R. 190, was an authority in point. The distinction is also clearly made in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 47, supra, which holds that an instrument executed in another state, and not stamped as required by the laws of that state, was nevertheless admissible because that law did not make the instrument invalid, but merely inadmissible.

Satterthwaite v. Doughty, 44 N. C. (Bushee L.) 314, 59 Am. Dec. 554, made the same distinction between provisions rendering an unstamped instrument invalid and those rendering it inadmissible, but came to a different conclusion than the preceding case, with reference to the effect of the statute of the sister state, and therefore excluded the instrument in question.

Kohn v. The Renaissance, 5 La. Ann. 25, and Ludlow v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. 94, hold, in effect, that the courts will not take notice of, or enforce, the revenue laws of a foreign country. It is not clear in either of these cases what the effect of the omission of a stamp is under the foreign laws, but they do not seem to recognize any distinction, and the language is broad enough to cover cases involving provisions invalidating unstamped instruments. And the doctrine of Ludlow v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. 94, was applied in Skinner v. Tinker, 34 Barb. 333, upon the assumption that the instrument was void, under the foreign law, for want of a stamp.

The court in Arrendiaz v. Serna, 40 Tex. 201, said that it was sometimes held that the courts of one country do not ordinarily consider themselves bound to decide upon the effect of the revenue laws of another, upon the validity of contracts made there and sought to be enforced by parties within its jurisdiction, but said it was not necessary to decide whether that doctrine applied to the present case.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FOURTH CIRCUIT.

J. J. HUGGINS et al., Appts.,
v.

William F. DALEY.

(99 Fed. Rep. 606.)

1. The boring of a well within ninety days is a condition precedent to the continuance of an oil and gas lease which, in consideration of $1, grants all the oil and gas in certain land, with the privilege of operating therefor for the term of five years, and as much longer as oil or gas is found in paying quantities, not exceeding thirty-five years from date, with a royalty of one seventh part or share of the oil produced and saved, but with a proviso that a well shall be completed within ninety days, in default of which the lessee shall pay a forfeiture of $50, since the only substantial consideration consists of the prospective royalties.
2. No judicial proceeding is necessary to avoid an oil and gas lease for failure to comply with a condition precedent by boring a well, where the lease merely gives the right to the oil and gas, with the privilege of operating therefor on the land, since the landlord has never been out of possession, and cannot re-enter upon himself.
3. It is matter of common knowledge, of which the courts will take notice, that oil and gas lie far below the surface of the ground and may flow unrestrained if the owner of adjoining land bores a well down to the strata which holds them, so that they may be taken from the land without any compensation.

(February 6, 1900.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of West Virginia in favor of complainant in a proceeding to restrain defendants from operating under an oil lease and to cancel the lease as a cloud on complainant's title. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Simonton, Circuit Judge, and Paul and Brawley, District Judges.

Messrs. W. W. Van Winkle and B. M. Ambler, for appellants:

The decisions of the supreme court of West Virginia as to construction and effect of oil leases will be followed by the Federal courts.

Foster v. Elk Fork Oil & Gas Co. 61 U. S. App. 576, 90 Fed. Rep. 178, 32 C. C. A. 500.

The discovery and production of oil is a condition precedent to the continuance or the vesting of a demise for oil purposes.

Whenever the lessor has the right to avoid an oil lease, he may get rid of it without judicial proceeding, but by an unequivocal election to treat it as void, as by the giving of a new lease.

The lessee under the new lease so given is entitled to operate and develop the property without molestation.

Munroe v. Armstrong, 96 Pa. 307.

A lease for the purpose of operating for oil or gas for a period of five years, and so much longer as oil or gas is found, on no other consideration than prospective oil royalty and gas rental, vests no title in the lessee except the mere right of exploration; but the title thereto, both as to the period of five years and the time thereafter, remains inchoate, and contingent on the finding of oil and gas in paying quantities.

Brawley, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia. The appellee filed a bill in equity alleging that one A. P. Hodges had obtained from F. P. Marshall a lease for oil and gas upon a certain tract of 50 acres of land situated in Ritchie county, West Virginia, which had been assigned to him, and that subsequently said Marshall had leased the identical premises to J. J. and J. B. Huggins; and the prayer of the bill was that the said Huggins and their associates should be restrained in prosecuting the work for developing said leasehold for oil, and that a receiver be appointed to take possession of said leasehold premises and operate the same, and that a decree should be entered canceling said lease as a cloud upon the title of the appellee.

Marshall was an illiterate farmer, the owner in fee of the tract of land described; and on March 12, 1897, he entered into an agreement, under seal, of which the substantial parts are as follows: In consideration of one dollar paid by Hodges, the lessee, the lessor "does hereby grant, demise, and let unto the said lessee all the oil and gas in and under the following described tract of land, and also said tract of land for the purpose of operating thereon for oil and gas, with the right to use water therefrom, and all rights and privileges necessary or convenient for conducting said operations and the transportation of oil and gas, and waiving all rights to claim or hold any of the property or improvements placed or erected in and upon said land by the lessee as fixtures or as part of the realty."

Then follows the description of the land. The habendum clause is as follows: "To have the same unto and for the use of the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of five years from the date thereof, and as much longer as oil or gas is found in paying quantities thereon, not exceeding the term of thirty-five years from the date thereof; yielding and paying to the lessor the one-seventh part or share of all the oil produced and saved on the premises."

Then follows a further description of the method of delivering the oil into tanks, and a reservation of gas for the personal use of the lessor, and a proviso which is in the following terms: "Provided, however, that a well shall be commenced upon the above-described premises within thirty, and completed within ninety, days from the date hereof; and, in case of failure to commence and complete said well as aforesaid, the lessee shall pay to the lessor a forfeiture of $50."

This lease was not recorded until April 8, 1898. At the same time was recorded an assignment of a half interest in said lease by Hodges to Daley, dated April 2, 1897, and acknowledged on April 4, 1898, and the assignment of the remaining half interest, dated April 2, 1898, and acknowledged April 4, 1898. The lease from Marshall to J. J. and J. B. Huggins was executed November 6, 1897, and recorded January 31, 1898.

Much testimony was taken tending to show that at the time of the execution of the lease Marshall was under the impression that the lease was only for ninety days, and that he believed that the words "five years" had been stricken from the printed form of the lease, and "ninety days" written therein; and in the copy of the lease which was given to him by Hodges the words "five years" were stricken out, and "ninety days" substituted, but it appears that the substitution was not in the handwriting of Hodges. The proviso was in the handwriting of Hodges; the remainder of the lease being printed, with the exception of some interlineations. There was also testimony to the effect that Daley was a partner of Hodges, and that Hodges had taken the lease for the benefit of the Cairo Oil Company, and impeaching the bona fides of the assignment to Daley. The conclusions reached by us do not require the determination of these questions, if, indeed, they are properly before us. It is undisputed that nothing was done by Hodges towards boring the well. It is clear from the testimony that he had no intention at any time to bore the well within the ninety days stipulated, and that he had not the means to do so if he had any such intention. In November following the execution of the lease to Hodges, the appellants leased from one Moore the land adjoining Marshall's for the purpose of operating for oil, and began to bore a well within 100 feet of Marshall's line, and about the same time they leased the land of Marshall for the purpose of operating for oil. At the time they took this lease they had knowledge that Hodges had some claim upon the land, and Marshall exhibited to them what purported to be a copy of the Hodges lease. In this copy, as above stated, the words "five years" had been stricken out, and "ninety days" substituted; and after submitting the copy to a lawyer, and being informed that the lease had no further validity, they commenced operations upon the Marshall land, and expended about $3,600 in the boring of a well. About the time they struck pay sand, and after the well upon the Moore land was flowing oil, on April 15, 1898, Daley filed his bill for injunction. Their lease had been recorded January 31, and some time between that day and the filing of the bill, but after they had commenced operations, Daley came upon the land, and informed them that he had some claim thereto: but the Hodges lease and assignment to Daley was not recorded until April 8, ten days before the filing of the bill.

The question for decision is whether the proviso in the Hodges lease constituted a condition precedent, and whether the failure of Hodges to do anything towards the boring of the well did not prevent the vesting of any rights under that lease. By the terms of that instrument the lessor granted to the lessee all the oil and gas in and under the land described, "and also the said tract of land for the purpose of operating thereon for oil and gas." By a course of decisions it is well settled in West Virginia that a lease of this character is not a grant of property in the oil or in the land, but merely a grant of possession for the purpose of searching for and procuring oil. The title is inchoate, and for the purpose of exploration only until the oil is found. If it is not found, no estate vests in the lessee; and, where the sole compensation to the landlord is a share of what is produced, there is always an implied covenant for diligent search and operation. There is, perhaps, no other business in which prompt performance is so essential to the rights of the parties, or delays so likely to prove injurious,—no other class of contracts in which time is so much of the essence. There is no other branch of mining where greater damage is done by delay. Coal and precious metals lie either in horizontal veins or in pockets. They remain where they are until removed. Oil and gas are the most uncertain, fluctuating, volatile, and fugitive of all mining properties. They lie far below the surface, beyond the control of human will, and beyond the reach of any legal process, whence they may flow unrestrained if the owner of adjoining land bores a well down to the strata which holds them; and there is no law which can provide adequate, or indeed any, compensation for such results. This is a matter of common knowledge, and "courts will generally take notice of whatever ought to be generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction." Greenl. Ev. § 6. It furnished the ground upon which the plaintiff in this case asks the court, through a receiver, to bore the well which the lessee was required to bore within ninety days from the date of execution of the instrument under which he claims. The only consideration which moved the lessor to grant the lease was the prospective royalties from oil and gas, which could come only if the lessee complied with the terms of this proviso that required the boring of a well: for, while the sum of $1 is technically a valuable, it is only a nominal, consideration. If the contention of the plaintiff is correct, the lessee, Hodges, or his assigns, could have waited the full term of five years without expending $1 or moving a hand for the development of the leased property, meantime tying the hands of the owner of the land, forbidding him to make arrangement with any other persons for the explorations which the lessee undertook to make, and perhaps suffering irreparable injury from the drainage of his oil and gas. This is the contract which a court of equity is asked to enforce. It is a short view of the range of equitable principles. There are no precise technical words which distinguish conditions precedent or subsequent. Whether they are one or the other is a matter of construction, to be solved by ascertaining the intention of the party creating the estate. They are not determined merely by the structure of the instrument, or the arrangement of the covenants. Where mutual covenants go to the whole consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions,—the one precedent to the other. 4 Kent, Com. 144. Where the undertaking on one side is, in terms, a condition to the stipulation on the other (that is, where the contract provides for the performance of some act or the happening of some event, and the obligations of the contract are made to depend on such performance or happening), the conditions are conditions precedent. The reason and the sense of the contemplated transaction as it must have been understood by the parties, and is to be collected from the whole contract, determines whether this is so or not, or it may be determined from the nature of the acts to be done, and the order in which they must necessarily precede and follow each other in the progress of performance. But when the act of one is not necessary to the act of the other, though it would be convenient, useful, or beneficial, yet, as the want of it does not prevent performance, and the loss and inconvenience can be compensated in damages, performance of the one is not a condition precedent to performance by the other. The nonperformance on one side must go to the entire substance of the contract and to the whole consideration, so that it may safely be inferred as the intent and just construction of the contract that, if the act to be performed on the one side is not done, there is no consideration for the stipulation on the other side. New Orleans v. Texas & P. R. Co. 171 U. S. 334, 43 L. ed. 186, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 875. "When one act is to be done by one party before another act, which is the consideration of it, is to be done by the other, the covenants are dependent, and the other is not bound to perform until the first act has been done, because the first act is a condition precedent to performance of the other; and, in all cases where covenants are dependent, they are in the nature of conditions precedent, and must be performed in the order of time in which performance is provided for in the covenant; and, in determining whether covenants are dependent or independent, the intention of the parties and the good sense of the case will be regarded, rather than the technical sense of the words used." Wood, Land. & T. § 342.

In construing this agreement in the light of all the facts surrounding contracts of this nature, and of the considerations moving the grantor in its execution, we have no difficulty in determining that the boring of a well by the grantee was the whole consideration of the lease, that nonperformance went to the entire substance of the contract, that the word "provided" is an apt word of condition, that the grantee did not, and at the time he procured the lease did not intend to, comply with the condition which was a condition precedent to the vesting of any title in the leased lands. In cases of conditions precedent, the consideration is the performance of the thing stipulated to be done, not the promise.

But it is contended by the appellee that the clause providing a forfeit of $50 for failure to bore the well within ninety days provides full compensation for failure to perform the condition. As a matter of fact, the $50 was not paid or legally tendered; but, inasmuch as the grantor had declared a purpose not to receive the forfeit money, it will be treated as if it had been tendered. The question whether a sum of money stipulated to be paid is a penalty or liquidated damages is sometimes difficult of determination, there being no criterion of universal application. It depends upon a construction of the whole instrument, the intention of the parties, the nature of the act to be performed, and the consequences which would naturally flow from its nonperformance. In many of the cases where oil leases have come before the courts, the doing of a certain thing, or the payment of rental in lieu thereof, is stipulated in the contract in a way that justifies the conclusion that the parties have provided exact and just compensation by way of liquidated damages for failure of performance in contracts, where parties stipulate in the alternative, and are free to choose. But where consequences likely to follow nonperformance are not measureable by any exact pecuniary standard, and the probable damage is out of all proportion to the amount agreed to be paid, this sum should be considered a penalty; and such we hold it to be in this case, where the sum of $50 is stated to be a forfeiture. It is in the nature of a security for the performance, and cannot be held to be liquidated damages for nonperformance.

In French v. Macale, 2 Dru. & W. 274, Lord St. Leonard thus states the doctrine which we hold to be applicable here: "The general rule of equity is that if a thing be agreed upon to be done, though there is a penalty annexed to secure its performance, yet the very thing itself must be done."

And in Dooley v. Watson, 1 Gray, 414, Chief Justice Shaw says: "Courts of equity have long since overruled the doctrine that a bond for the payment of money, conditioned to be void on the conveyance of land, is to be treated as a mere agreement to pay money. When the penalty appears to be intended merely as a security for the performance of the agreement, the principal object of the parties will be carried out."

If a party can show that he has done everything in his power, but by unavoidable accident, by fraud, surprise, or ignorance not wilful, has been prevented from executing his covenant literally, the courts will relieve him, especially where the case admits of compensation for his nonperformance, or the parties can be put in the same situation as if the condition had been performed; but no ground for equitable relief can be found in a case where the party has not only failed to perform the conditions upon which alone he obtained the execution of the contract, but where it is also clear that he never at any time intended to perform, or had the means to do so. "There is no more intrinsic sanctity in stipulations by contract than in other solemn acts of parties, which are constantly interfered with by courts of equity upon the broad ground of public policy, or the pure principles of natural justice. Where a penalty or forfeiture is designed merely as a security to enforce the principal obligation, it is as much against conscience to allow any party to pervert it to a different and oppressive purpose, as it would be to allow him to substitute another for the principal obligation." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1316.

The principles announced by this court in Foster v. Elk Fork Oil & Gas Co. 61 U. S. App. 576, 32 C. C. A. 560, 90 Fed. Rep. 178, 48 L. R. A.

govern and sustain the conclusion reached, although the precise point here determined was not involved. In that case the demise was for ten years, and there was a covenant that a well should be completed within one year, and in case of failure the lessee was to pay 10 cents per acre per annum after the time for completing the well as specified. The lessee bored one well, which proved to be dry, and no further effort was made. The court says: "The completion of the well saves the penalty. It does not amount to a fulfilment of the covenants. The consideration therefore for this lease was the prospective rents and royalties the lessor would enjoy if the lessee, by diligent search, could find oil and gas in paying quantities. If the lease failed to bind the lessee to diligent search for oil or gas, it was without consideration, binding on neither party, and voidable at the pleasure of either."

Numerous cases were cited,—among them, those from West Virginia which this court held to lay down rules of property stating the controlling doctrine peculiar to mining leases in that state, which the Federal courts would recognize and follow. This case fully establishes the doctrine that the consideration in leases of this character "evidently and clearly contemplates active operations upon the demised premises," and when, after one failure, no further effort is made, mere inaction on the part of the lessee may well be construed an abandonment of rights under his leases. The case of Steelsmith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 44 L. R. A. 107, 29 S. E. 978, was cited to sustain these conclusions. That was a lease to Knotts and Garber for oil purposes, providing certain royalties, with a stipulation that a well should be completed within one year; and the failure to do so rendered the lease null and void, unless the lessee should pay 25 cents per acre from and after the date stipulated for the completion of the well, when such payment should operate to extend the time for five years. No well was drilled, and the lessor, considering the lease forfeited, refused to accept the rent therefor. His lessee's executor, before the expiration of five years, executed a new lease to Gartlan, February 11, 1895, which required him to drill a well within one month, with stipulations for the payment of $50 per month for any delay in completing the well. The term was for five years, and there was a stipulation that a failure to comply with any of its stipulations should render it void. Gartlan drilled a well, but, not finding oil or gas in paying quantities, removed his derrick and tools, and left the premises. The land was leased in October, 1896, to Steelsmith who forthwith commenced operations, and filed a bill to cancel the Gartlan lease, and Knotts and Garber filed a cross bill. The court held that there being no provision for any further operations after the first well when completed, was nonproductive, "the contract is at an end as to both parties as soon as such first well is abandoned as unsuccessful," quoting Venture Oil Co. v. Fretts, 152 Pa. 451, 25 Atl. 732: "A veste title cannot ordinarily be lost by abandonment in a less time than fixed by the statute of limitations, unless there is satisfactory proof of an intention to abandon. An oil lease stands on quite different ground. The title is inchoate, and for purposes of exploration only until oil is found. If it is not found, no estate vests in the lessee, and his title, whatever it is, ends when the unsuccessful search is abandoned."

The lessee in that case [Steelsmith v. Garlan] had complied with the covenant to bore a well, and the court says: "He could not . . . be compelled to put down another well, and, he not being bound, the lessor was not bound, either; for the only consideration left to her was the prospective oil royalties and gas rentals, which the lessee was in position to entirely defeat. Contracts unperformed, optional as to one of the parties, are optional as to both."

Again: "Such leases are construed most strictly against the lessee, and favorable to the lessor. . . . When a lease provides the mode, manner, and character of search to be made, implications in regard thereto are excluded thereby, as repugnant. And the demise, for the purpose of operating for oil and gas for the period of five years, is dependent on the discovery of oil and gas in the search provided for; and, if such search is unsuccessful, the demise fails therewith, as such discovery is a condition precedent to the continuance or vesting of the demise. The lessee's title, being inchoate and contingent, both as to the five years limit and time thereafter, on the finding of oil and gas in paying quantities, did not become vested by reason of his putting down a nonproductive well."

While most of the cases cited have gone upon the ground of abandonment, the governing principle in all oil leases of the character under consideration is that the discovery and production of oil is a condition precedent to the continuance or vesting of any estate in the demised premises; that such leases vest no present title in the lessee, and if, at any time, the lessee has the option to suspend operations, the lease is no longer binding on the lessor because of want of mutuality; and, where the only consideration is prospective royalty to come from exploration and development, failure to explore and develop renders the agreement a mere nudum pactum, and works a forfeiture of the lease, for it is of the very essence of the contract that work should be done. And, the smaller the tract of land, the more imperative is the need for prompt and efficient drilling; for oil operations cumber the land, rendering it unavailable for agricultural purposes. The landowner is entitled to his royalty as promptly as it can be had. The danger of drainage from his small holding is increased by delay, and the resulting damage, not being susceptible of pecuniary measurement, is therefore not compensable. No such lease should be so construed as to enable the lessee who has paid no consideration to hold it merely for speculative purposes, without doing what he stipulated to do, and what was clearly in the contemplation of the lessor when he entered into the agreement. Leaving out the proviso which bound the lessee to diligent search and development, there is nothing in this lease which bound him to do anything whatever. The proof is clear that he never intended to drill the well within the time stipulated. This proviso was written by the lessee evidently for purposes of deception. He knew that the object of the lessor was to secure diligent search for oil, and he was "keeping the word of promise to the ear, and breaking it to the hope;" skilfully turning it into a mere speculative lease, binding the lessor and leaving himself free. It would be unconscionable to hold the lessor bound. "Law, as a science, would be unworthy of the name, if it did not, to some extent, provide the means of preventing the mischiefs of improvidence, rashness, blind confidence, and credulity, on one side, and of skill, avarice, cunning, and a gross violation of the principles of morals and conscience, on the other." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1316.

In Twin-Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 593, 23 L. ed. 331, the facts were, to some extent, the converse of those here; but Mr. Justice Miller comments on the fluctuating character and value of this class of property, and asserts the injustice "of permitting one holding the right to assert an ownership in such property to voluntarily await the event, and then decide, when the danger which is over has been at the risk of another, to come in and share the profit," and referring to the distinction between real estate, whose value is fixed, says: "The class of property here considered is subject to the most rapid, frequent, and violent fluctuations in value of anything known as property, and requires prompt action in all who hold an option whether they will share its risks or stand clear of them, [and that] no delay for the purpose of enabling the defrauded party to speculate upon the chances which the future may give him of deciding profitably to himself whether he will abide by his bargain or rescind it, is allowed in a court of equity."

In a case like this no judicial proceeding was necessary to avoid the lease. The landlord, never having been out of possession, cannot re-enter upon himself; and it was held in Guffy v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 49, 11 S. E. 754, 8 L. R. A. 759, and in many other cases, that any unequivocally expressed election to avoid, as by giving a new lease, avoids the one preceding.

In Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. 713, the court says: "No lease of land for a rent for a return to the landlord out of the land which passes can be construed to be intended to enable the tenant merely to hold the lease for purposes of speculation, without doing and performing in connection therewith what the lease contemplated. Such a construction would, indeed, make all such contracts a snare for the entrapment and injury of the unwary landlord. A man buying and paying for land may do with it as he likes,—work it or let it lie idle. But a tenant to whom land passes for a specified purpose has no such discretion; he must perform what he stipulated to do.”

A recent author says: “The trend of the decisions touching questions of forfeiture arising out of oil and gas leases has been almost uniformly in favor of the lessor. Generally it is the lessee who is favored, and, after a substantial compliance by him with the terms of the contract, equity will not regard a technical breach. But with mining leases it is otherwise. This is due principally to the nature of the business of mining, and more especially oil mining,—to the temptation offered a shrewd operator to purchase at a nominal price the right to develop lands, the owner of which is ignorant of their real value, and then to hold them indefinitely, neither working them himself, nor permitting another to do so.” “But a lessee, where the instrument presents a semblance of inequity or unfairness, will find that he has a thorny road to travel before a court of equity will sanction his claims.” Bryan, Petroleum, 146.

We are of opinion, upon the whole case, that the exploration for and development of oil and gas was the sole consideration for this lease; that the proviso requiring the boring of a well within ninety days was a condition precedent to the vesting of any interest in the lessee, and that the forfeiture of $50 was intended merely as a penalty to secure the drilling of the well, and, if paid, would have been merely compensation to the landowner for the right of the lessee to possession during the ninety days, and such payment would not be so far a compliance with the conditions of the lease as to vest in the lessee a title in the leased premises for the period of five years; that after the expiration of ninety days from the date of the lease, there being no provision therein for any work to be done by the lessee in the development of the property, which was the sole consideration therefor, the lessor had the option to avoid it; that the inaction of the lessee during a period of eight months, while operations were being commenced on adjoining land, calculated to drain the land of the lessor and irreparably injure him, fully justified his avoidance of the lease; and that the lease to Huggins and his associates was an unequivocal declaration of his intention to avoid it, and terminated any inchoate right which Hodges could claim thereunder.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to restore the leased premises to the appellants, and that the receiver be directed to turn over to them any moneys in his hands as the result of his operations, after deducting whatever sum may have been actually and necessarily expended by him in the development of the same, and that the bill be dismissed, with costs.

City of PONTIAC, Plff. in Err.,
v.
TALBOT PAVING COMPANY.

(94 Fed. Rep. 65, 36 C. C. A. 88.)

1. A general verdict for plaintiff is not conclusive in the appellate court upon the question whether or not the declaration states a cause of action.
2. A municipal corporation is not liable to an action for refusal to proceed to levy a new special assessment to pay for street improvements after the original one was set aside for irregularity, under a contract by which the contractor agreed to look only to such assessments for his compensation and to take the risk of their invalidity, in accordance with a statute which expressly provides that the claim shall not become a public charge in any event, but the duty, if it exists, must be enforced by mandamus.
3. When a municipal corporation has exercised the power conferred by Ill. Rev. Stat. art. 9, chap. 24, § 1, of prescribing the method of payment for local improvements, and the work has been done, to be paid for by special assessment, the expense cannot be made a general charge against the city.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern Division of the Northern District of Illinois to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's refusal to order a new assessment for the expense of a street pavement under a contract performed by plaintiff. Reversed.

Before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Seaman, District Judge.

Statement by Seaman, District Judge:

Judgment is entered against the city of Pontiac, plaintiff in error and defendant below, in an action on the case, upon a general finding by the court that the defendant is guilty, and that plaintiff's damages are assessed at the sum of $12,343; a trial by jury being waived. The alleged cause of action, as set out in the several counts of the declaration, is failure and neglect on the part of the municipal authorities to provide “for a new special tax assessment” against contiguous property, to pay amounts earned under a contract for the paving and improvement of certain streets under the following state of facts: On June 27, 1895, an ordinance was adopted by the city of Pontiac for the improvement of certain streets, whereby the expense of street intersections was to be paid by general taxation, and “the remainder of cost of said improvement should be paid for by special taxation, to be assessed, levied, and collected against real estate abutting on the lines of said

NOTE.—As to agreement that assessments shall be accepted as payment for public improvement, and that city shall not be otherwise liable, see Darber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Harrisburg (C. C. A. 3d C.) 20 L. R. A. 401.

streets so ordered to be improved," in accordance with the provisions of article 9 of chapter 24 of the statute of the state of Illinois entitled "An Act to Provide for the Incorporation of Cities and Villages." The general act so referred to declares, by § 49 of article 9 (1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) 2d ed. pp. 777 et seq.), that "all persons taking any contract with the city or village, and who agree to be paid from special assessments, shall have no claim or lien upon the city or village in any event, except from the collection of the special assessment made for the work contracted for." Section 64 of the same article provides that vouchers issued for the work shall be subject to like condition, whether the holders are the original contractors or their assigns. Proceedings were taken under the ordinance, the special tax assessments were made and confirmed, and thereupon a contract was entered into between Talbot Paving Company, the plaintiff below, and the city of Pontiac, whereby that company, as the lowest bidder, undertook to "furnish all labor and material for the construction of said local improvement" for the aggregate sum of $15,168.90, to be paid when completed and accepted.—"and when the special tax levied under said ordinance, or any special tax which shall thereafter be levied by said city, upon the property contiguous to said improvement, should be collected," and also when the general tax provided for the cost of street intersections was collected; and the contract further provides, in express terms, that "they shall make no claims against said city, in any event, except from the collections" so referred to, and that the contractors "take all risk of the invalidity of any such special tax." The work was performed by the contractor and accepted by the city, but payment was not made, except for the cost of the intersections raised by general tax, and portions of the special assessments which were paid in by certain property owners. The balance thus left unpaid was $10,567.33, for which "local-improvement vouchers" were issued, reciting that they were to be paid out of the special assessments when collected, and that the city was exempt from other liability. The declaration states that the failure to collect the special taxes in the first instance arose out of the prosecution by lotowners of an appeal to the supreme court of the state, which resulted in a judgment "holding the said ordinance providing for said special tax assessment invalid, thereby rendering it impossible, under said ordinance, to collect said special tax from said property to pay the balance due the plaintiff." Bradford v. Pontiac, 165 Ill. 612, 46 N. E. 794, is cited in the briefs as the case so referred to. After this decision, the Talbot Paving Company presented its petition to the city council for the adoption of a supplemental ordinance "for the assessment of a special tax upon the property contiguous to said improvement" to pay the balance due, but the city council failed to make provision to that end, and the action rests upon the allegation of negligence and willful refusal on that behalf. The defendant demurred to the declaration, stating several grounds, but the demurrer was overruled, and the defendant, being required to plead instantly, filed its plea of not guilty, and trial before the court proceeded upon the merits.

Mr. W. T. Whiting for defendant in error.

Seaman, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The general finding by the court clearly determines all issues of fact. Fourth Nat. Bank v. Belleville, 53 U. S. App. 628, 83 Fed. Rep. 675, 27 C. C. A. 674, and cases cited. But it is not conclusive on all the questions involved, as contended on behalf of the defendant in error. Its utmost effect is to limit the inquiry on review "to the sufficiency of the complaint and of the rulings, if any be preserved, on questions of law arising during the trial." Lehnen v. Dickson, 143 U. S. 71, 72, 37 L. ed. 373, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 481. In the case of general verdict on a trial by jury, the finding establishes all the material facts which are alleged in the declaration. If, however, the declaration on which either verdict or finding must rest "fails to state a cause of action, and clearly shows that upon the case as stated the plaintiff cannot recover," the error is not cured by verdict, and is not waived by answering and proceeding to trial after the demurrer is overruled. Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 242, 246, 28 L. ed. 415, 417, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 420. In such case, there is no foundation for the judgment, and that inquiry is clearly presented for review on this record. Whether considered as raised by the demurrer, or upon the objections and exceptions covering all the testimony to support the declaration, or upon the facts stated and found, is not material.

The defendant in error entered upon the performance of its contract for the street improvement under the express statutory provision that payment could be made solely out of special assessments against property abutting on the improvement, and that the contractor should "have no lien or claim upon the city . . . in any event, except from the collection of the special assessments made for the work contracted for." The ordinance by which the paving in question was authorized and let expressly referred to this statute; this condition of payment was clearly stipulated both in the contract and in the vouchers, which were finally issued and accepted for the unpaid instalments in controversy; and the contract further provided that the contractor "shall take all risk of the invalidity of any such special tax, the said city not to be liable in any event by reason of the invalidity of said special tax assessment, or any of them, or of the proceedings thereon, but only for failure to collect the same, the same being collectible in law." Proceedings were taken, and the special assessments were made, but on appeal by lotowners it was held by the 48 L. R. A.

supreme court that the ordinance was invalid by reason of provisions which committed to the city engineer an unauthorized discretion relative to the improvement, and the assessments were set aside. As the necessary result of this adjudication, which involved the entire amount unpaid on the contract, the assessments were not collected and the vouchers were not paid. The city council has since refused to take action for a new special assessment to charge the deficiency against the abutting property; and it is urged, in defense of such nonaction, that its power is exhausted, and that no such assessment can be made, under the decision referred to. Whether the power subsisted in the city council to provide for a reassessment notwithstanding the defect in the original ordinance appears to have been the main subject of controversy in the trial court; and, for the purposes of the present inquiry, it is assumed that the decision there in favor of the power is not only in accord with justice, but is sustained as well by interpretations placed upon the statute by the supreme court. On that assumption the duty of the city is manifest to proceed promptly in the exercise of its power to assess and collect the unpaid amounts, and such duty can be enforced by mandamus, if remedies at law are not adequate for the adjustment of all rights.

The statute which confers authority for making the improvement in question imperatively requires that the expense, aside from street intersections, shall be borne by the abutting property, through special assessment, and shall not become a public charge "in any event." The provision is of general application to cities and villages in the state of Illinois, and is in accord with a rule of public policy which is common in municipal charters and is upheld by judicial authority. If, however, the contractor who performs work so authorized, has the right to recover the contract price against the municipality, by way of damages, in the event of neglect or refusal on the part of the public officers to perform their duty in enforcing the special assessments, the way is clearly open to evade and nullify the legislative purpose. By their conduct,—either through negligence, ignorance, or collusion,—the city council or officers may impose upon the public the expense of the improvement, in despite of the statute which declares it a special benefit, to be paid exclusively by abutting lotowners. Indeed, if this judgment is sustainable, it so operates in the present case, as no provision appears for collecting the amount of such recovery by a supplemental special assessment against the lotowners. On the other hand, a complete remedy is clearly open to the contractor, by a proceeding in the proper forum, to ascertain the power, and thereupon enforce the ministerial duty to make the new assessment in obedience to the statute and violating none of its provisions.

The contention, however, on behalf of the defendant in error, is predicated on the duty which is imposed by law upon the municipi-pality to make provision for the special assessment, and on the general doctrine, held in a line of authorities and well recognized in Illinois, of municipal liability for failure or neglect on the part of its officers to discharge the public duty. The question whether this doctrine applies to any case "where the expense of making a local improvement is not to be raised by a general tax, but solely upon the property benefited," to the extent of furnishing the contractor a right to recover his compensation in an action against the corporation founded on its failure to make the necessary assessment, has given rise to decisions which are not in accord in the various jurisdictions. In 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 482, numerous cases are collated in a note, and the learned author well remarks in the text: "The right to a general judgment should, in our opinion, be limited, in any event, to cases where the corporation can afterwards reimburse itself by an assessment; for why should all be taxed for the failure of the council to do its duty in a case where the contractor has a plain remedy, by mandamus, to compel the council to make the necessary assessment, and proceed in the collection thereof with the requisite diligence." But examination of the cases there noted as favoring the general recovery, and as well those cited in the brief of counsel in support of this judgment, reveals no instance of such allowance in the face of a statute expressly prohibiting the payment or collection as a public charge in any event, and the extreme view of liability held in the two leading citations (Keilly v. Albany, 112 N. Y. 30, 42, 19 N. E. 508, and Commercial Nat. Bank v. Portland, 24 Or. 188, 33 Pac. 532) would merely disregard the contract stipulations, and not affect a case so limited by statute. In People ex rel. Ready v. Syracuse, 144 N. Y. 63, 66, 38 N. E. 1006, the New York court of appeals appears to disapprove the doctrine of Keilly v. Albany, 112 N. Y. 30, 42, 19 N. E. 508, holding that no action is maintainable against the city, even in such case, for the failure to make an assessment, but the "proper remedy was to compel, by mandamus, the officers of the city having the matter in charge to proceed with their duties as required by law."

However the consensus or weight of authority shall ultimately determine the remedy of the contractor for local improvements, where the statute authorizes payment by special assessment, but is merely directory in its terms to that end, or where the collection is limited by ordinance or contract to such assessments, and the authorities fail to provide for or to carry out the assessment, we are clearly of opinion that no general doctrine of municipal liability for mere nonfeasance in the failure or neglect of council or officers to perform a duty of the municipality can be extended to override per se the inhibitions expressed in this statute, and that the contractor must proceed by mandamus to enforce his claim. The decisions in support of this view are well considered, and apparently without conflict, and the following are leading and pertinent examples: Fletcher v. Oshkosh, 18 Wis. 220; Greencastle v. Allen, 43 Ind. 347; Goodrich v. Detroit, 12 Mich. 279; Reock v. Newark, 33 N. J. L. 129; People ex rel. Ready v. Syracuse, 144 N. Y. 63, 38 N. E. 1006. See also Elliott, Roads & Streets, 436, and note; Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 1191. In Fletcher v. Oshkosh, 18 Wis. 229, Mr. Justice Paine, speaking for the court in reference to a case which is practically identical, says: "Now, in the face of this provision, which says that the city shall in no event be liable, we are asked to hold that if the money is not collected in a reasonable time, in the mode which is provided, the city shall be liable. . . . We know of no rule of construction, and certainly the counsel cited no case, that could justify a court in thus overriding a plain provision of law. Whoever contracts for this kind of work, or deals in these certificates, under such a charter, takes the risk of collecting his money in the manner provided, with a right to resort to the appropriate remedy to compel the officers to whom it is intrusted to discharge their duties, and he cannot come into a court and ask to hold the city liable, in the teeth of a provision which informed him at the outset that the city should, in no event, be liable."

So considered, support cannot be found for the judgment under the general authorities, and no foundation remains unless the cases cited by counsel sustain the further contention that a rule of decision prevails in the state of Illinois which establishes the primary liability of the municipality in such contingency through the failure to make the special assessment. The decisions invoked in that view are Clayburgh v. Chicago, 25 Ill. 535, 79 Am. Dec. 346, and Foster v. Alton, 173 Ill. 587, 51 N. E. 76; but in the first-mentioned case no statute was involved which forbade liability in any event on the part of the city, and in neither case was any rule of liability adopted which can be brought into the present statute, by way of construction, to sanction an inhibited recovery. In Clayburgh v. Chicago, 25 Ill. 535, 79 Am. Dec. 346, the question was of a different nature, and not within the statute. An action on the case was sustained in favor of a lotowner to recover of the city damages arising out of the taking of his property for public use in opening a street. The law provided for an assessment of benefits and damages to that end, the property was appropriated and the damages ascertained, but there was a refusal to enforce collection of the assessment. The terms of the statute are not stated, but, clearly, the remedy for compensation in such a case is not applicable, in any view, to a contractor, under the present statute. In Foster v. Alton, 173 Ill. 587, 51 N. E. 76, however, the same statute and like conditions as in the case at bar were present, except that suit was commenced by the contractor after he had petitioned for a reassessment, and before an ordinance could be adopted for that purpose; the action being based on the ground that the city "had exhausted its power, and could not make a reassessment, as it had agreed to do, and that it was therefore liable for the balance, to be paid by general taxation or out of the general fund." The decision of the supreme court denies the right of action, and is based solely upon the ground that a reassessment could be made for the collection; and, so far as it furnishes light, the ruling is distinctly adverse to recovery here, and appears to have been misapprehended by counsel. It is cited in the argument submitted on behalf of the defendant in error as stating in the opinion of the court: "This action cannot be maintained except upon the refusal or neglect of appellant to levy a reassessment, which is not claimed." This remark appears in the recital of facts only, and as a quotation from the findings of the appellate court of a reason for not remanding the cause. It is neither approved in the opinion, nor referred to as influencing the decision; nor could the excerpt have the force of a binding decision, if it were approved.

No ground appearing to authorize the recovery against the plaintiff in error, the judgment is reversed, with direction to sustain the demurrer to the declaration.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Seaman, District Judge, on October 3, 1899, handed down the following response:

The argument for rehearing rests upon a provision of the Revised Statutes of Illinois, not previously called to attention, found in § 1, art. 9, chap. 24 (1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) 2d ed. [art. 9, § 117] p. 736), which reads as follows:

"That the corporate authorities of cities and villages are hereby vested with power to make local improvements by special assessment or by special taxation, or both, of contiguous property, or general taxation, or otherwise, as they shall by ordinance prescribe."

In the light of this provision, it is clear that authority is conferred upon the municipality, when a local improvement is ordered, to determine, in reference to its nature, whether the expense shall be paid by special assessment, by general taxation, or by both methods: and that the remark in the opinion, as handed down, that the statute "imperatively requires that the expense, aside from street intersections, shall be borne by the abutting property," must be qualified accordingly. Improvements which are classified as "local" are of various kinds, many of them not proper subjects for special assessment; and by this statute the city council is vested with the power and the duty to determine the classification of the improvement, and establish by ordinance the appropriate method of defraying the expense. As stated in Morgan Park v. Wiswall, 155 Ill. 262, 267, 40 N. E. 611, 612: "The improvement being in truth and in fact a local improvement, the decision of the municipal authorities is final, when they adopt one or another of the modes prescribed by law for the purpose of raising funds for it." The power is "devolved upon the city council alone, and not upon the courts." See also Lightner v. Peoria, 150 Ill. 80, 87, 37 N. E. 69; Fagan v. Chicago, 84 Ill. 227.

The improvement in question was of the class generally recognized as a charge upon abutting property, was so determined by the city council, and the contract under which the work was performed so provided. Section 49 of the same article declares: "All persons taking any contracts with the city or village, and who agree to be paid from special assessments, shall have no claim or lien upon the city or village in any event, except from the collections of the special assessments made for the work contracted for." 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 2d ed. [art. 9, § 165] p. 777.

Section 64 establishes the same rule for claimants accepting or holding vouchers. Id. p. 784.

The expressions in the opinion have reference to these provisions, which are distinctly applicable here, and inhibit recovery in this action. The power so delegated to the corporate authorities can be exercised only for the object and in the manner prescribed. When it is exercised, and the work is performed, the latter provisions are controlling. If the assessment is "annulled by the city council," or "set aside by any court," the common council is empowered by § 46 to provide for a new assessment; and, "when the original ordinance proves defective and insufficient to support an assessment," the defect may be cured by amendment or supplemental ordinance and reassessment. East St. Louis v. Albrecht, 150 Ill. 506, 512, 37 N. E. 934. Such is the exclusive course open to this contractor, and mandamus is the sole remedy.

Rehearing is denied.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

M. L. DUNCAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
City of LYNCHBURG.

(.....Va.....)

1. A city is not liable for a nuisance created by the pollution of a stream by its employees and chain gang while operating a rock quarry outside the limits of the city, which its charter gives no authority to operate, unless it is implied from certain provisions which expressly include a denial of liability for the failure to exercise, or the improper exercise of, the powers thereby conferred.
2. Implied authority to operate a rock quarry outside the limits of a city is not conferred upon the city by general provisions in its charter for the purchase, holding, sale, and conveyance of real and personal property necessary for its uses and purposes.
3. A question as to the powers conferred by a city charter may be raised by demurrer in an action against the city for an alleged nuisance, since the court will take judicial notice of the charter.

ERROR to the Corporation Court of the City of Lynchburg to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful pollution of a stream of water flowing through plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Messrs. Wilson & Manson, for defendant in error:

The city can do no act and incur no liability, whether the act complained of is a tort or a contract, unless the act is within the city's powers as fixed by charter or by other statutes applicable to it. The power to do the act must be expressly granted or necessarily implied; if the power be fairly doubtful, the decision must be against the existence of the power, and the activities of the city officials, and their power to fix burdens on the taxpayers, are, as a rule, confined to its own limits, and do not extend to such acts as they may do and improvements they may see fit to make in the surrounding country.

Buchanan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case against the city of Lynchburg for creating and continuing a nuisance near the premises of the plaintiff, to the damage of the health and comfort of himself and family.

It is averred in the declaration that the defendant, while operating a rock quarry outside of the limits of the city, erected a privy for the use of its employees, including its chain gang, over a stream of water which runs under the front porch of the dwelling house occupied by the plaintiff, situated near by, and just below the quarry, and so polluted the stream as to render his premises unfit for habitation, and to cause serious sickness in his family.

The defendant demurred to the declaration upon the ground that the injury complained of was not caused by an act done within the scope of the power and authority of the city, but was the result of an ultra vires act, for which the city was not liable.

The trial court sustained the demurrer and gave judgment for the defendant. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The question presented for our determination is whether the nuisance complained of was created or continued by the agents or employees of the defendant city while engaged in a work which was within its corporate powers.

In order to render a municipal corporation liable in damages for the torts of its agents and employees, it is necessary, among other things, that the injury complained of be caused by, or result from, an act done in the exercise of some power conferred upon it by its charter or other positive enactment.

"If the act complained of," says Judge Dillon, "necessarily lies wholly outside of the general or special powers of the corporation, as conferred in its charter or by statute, the corporation can in no event be liable to an action for damages, whether it directly commanded the performance of the act, or whether it be done by its officers without its express command. . . . But, if the wrongful act be not in this sense ultra vires, 48 L. R. A.

it may be the foundation of an action of tort against the corporation, either when it was done by its officers under its previous direct authority, or has been ratified or adopted expressly or impliedly by it, or when it was done by the officers, agents, or servants of the corporation in the execution of corporate powers or the performance of corporate duties of a ministerial nature, and was done so negligently or unskilfully as to injure others, in which case the corporation is liable for the carelessness or want of skill of its officers or immediate servants or agents in the course of their authorized employment, without express adoption or ratifying act." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 968; Smith v. Rochester, 76 N. Y. 506; Cavanagh v. Boston, 139 Mass. 426, 52 Am. Rep. 716, 1 N. E. 834; Horn v. Baltimore, 30 Md. 218.

It is the settled law of this state that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and none others; First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied, or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Winchester v. Redmond, 93 Va. 711, 714, 25 S. E. 1001; Lynchburg & R. Street R. Co. v. Dameron, 95 Va. 545, 548, 28 S. E. 951; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89.

By § 7, chap. 6, of the charter of the city (Acts Assem. 1895-96, p. 201), it is provided that the council shall, in addition to the general powers vested in it by the laws of the state, have power "to purchase, hold, sell, and convey all real and personal property necessary for its uses and purposes" (subsec. 3); "to erect in or near the city suitable workhouses, houses of correction or reformation and houses for the reception and maintenance of the poor and destitute" (subsec. 5); "to establish and regulate public squares and parks in or near the city," and to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, the land deemed necessary for such uses (subsec. 6); "to establish water works or gas works within or without said city;" to acquire lands for such purposes by purchase or condemnation; and to protect from injury or pollution by proper penalties said works or anything connected therewith within or without the city, "and under this authority to prevent the pollution of the water in the river by prohibiting the throwing of filth or offensive matter therein for a distance of 6 miles above the limits of the city" (subsec. 7); "to establish or acquire by purchase and to operate within or without the corporate limits suitable works for the generation of electricity for illuminating or other purposes, and to acquire lands for such use by purchase or condemnation" (subsec. 8); "to provide in or near the city lands to be used as burial places for the dead and to improve and care for the same and the approaches thereto" (subsec. 17); and, concurrently with the board of supervisors of Campbell county, "to take care, supervision, and control for a distance of 2 miles from the city limits, of all public roads extending from the city into Campbell county, and jointly with said supervisors to close, extend, widen, narrow, lay out, graduate, pave, macadamize, and otherwise improve and alter said roads for such distance and to keep the same in good order and repair and to condemn the necessary land for the purpose. . . . Nothing contained herein shall be construed as compelling the exercise of the powers herein given or as fixing any liability on the said city for the failure to exercise or the improper exercise of the said powers, except damages for the land condemned, which are to be ascertained and fixed in the manner provided by the general laws of the state." Subsec. 39.

Power is given to city councils, under the general law, to provide in or near the city waterworks, cemeteries, hospitals, and pest houses. Code, §§ 1038, 1719, 1721.

None of the provisions of the charter nor of the General Statutes above quoted expressly confer upon the city the right to acquire and operate a rock quarry. If such power can be necessarily or fairly implied from the powers expressly granted, it must be under subsecs. 3 and 39 of § 7, chap. 6, of the charter. The power given by subsec. 3, which authorizes the city to purchase, hold, sell, and convey all real and personal property necessary for its uses and purposes, must, I apprehend, be exercised within, and not without, the limits of the city; for the general rule is that the power of a municipal corporation is confined to its own territorial limits, and, without some special provision authorizing it, it cannot possess any control or rights in or over lands lying without those limits. Denton v. Jackson, 2 Johns. Ch. 320, 336; Riley v. Rochester, 9 N. Y. 64; Coldwater v. Tucker, 36 Mich. 475, 477, 24 Am. Rep. 601; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 565.

"Municipal corporations," says Judge Dillon in the section cited, "being created chiefly as governmental agencies, and for the attainment of local objects merely, the general rule is that they cannot purchase and hold real estate beyond their territorial limits unless the power is conferred by the legislature. It has been expressly decided that a conveyance to a municipal corporation of lands beyond its boundaries for the purpose of a street is void, though the corporation has by its charter power 'to purchase, hold, and convey any real property for the public use of the corporation.' The author, however, is inclined to think that there are purposes for which such corporation may without special grant purchase and hold extraterritorial lands, as for a pest house, cemetery, and the like objects of a municipal character."

If it be true, as the learned author is inclined to think, that a municipal corporation without special authority may purchase and hold lands without its limits for some purposes, it must be because the lands are indispensably necessary to enable it to protect the health and well-being of its people.

It might be convenient for a municipal corporation to own and operate a rock quarry, but it is manifestly not indispensable that it should do so, in order that it may accomplish the objects of its creation.

Again, the provisions of the charter conferring special power upon the city to acquire lands without the city for workhouses, houses of correction or reformation or the reception of the poor, public squares or parks, water works and gas works, electric plants, the burial of the dead, and highways in the county of Campbell, would seem to exclude the idea that it was the intention of the legislature, in granting the charter, to confer any other extraterritorial powers upon the city than those expressly named.

If the power to acquire and operate a rock quarry can be necessarily or fairly implied from the provisions of subsection 39 (§ 7, chap. 6, of the charter), which authorizes the city, in connection with the county of Campbell, to pave and macadamize, among other things, the highways of that county for a distance of 2 miles from the city, it would not aid the plaintiff; for it is expressly provided in that section that nothing in it shall be construed as compelling the exercise of the powers conferred by it, or as fixing any liability on the city for the failure to exercise, or the improper exercise of the powers conferred, except damages for lands condemned for public highways. The object of that provision was manifestly to protect the city from any other or further liability than the county of Campbell (its associate in establishing and maintaining the roads) would be under in exercising the powers conferred. And, as is well settled, the county being one of the political subdivisions of the state, it would not be liable in damages to the plaintiff if it or its agents or employees had caused the injury complained of. Fry v. Albemarle County, 86 Va. 195, 9 S. E. 1004; Field v. Albemarle County (Va.) 20 S. E. 954; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 23, 963, note 1; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 256.

The contention of the plaintiff in error that the question of whether or not the work in which the city officials were engaged when the nuisance complained of was created was within its powers could not be raised by demurrer, but only by a plea, is wholly untenable. The courts take judicial notice of the charters of municipal corporations. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 83; 4 Minor, Inst. 1210, 1211; Code, § 3328; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 4, note 3. And, if the cause of action stated in the declaration is one for which the corporation is not liable, a demurrer is the proper and usual way to raise the question. Sayre v. Northwestern Turnp. Road, 10 Leigh, 454; Noble v. Richmond, 31 Gratt. 271, 31 Am. Rep. 726; Orme v. Richmond, 79 Va. 86; Powell v. Wythcliffe, 95 Va. 73, 27 S. E. 805; Maia v. Eastern State Hospital Directors, 97 Va. 507, 34 S. E. 617.

It follows from what has been said that the defendant was not liable in damages for the injury complained of, that the demurrer was properly sustained by the trial court, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

J. W. DOSTER, Appt.,
v.
MANISTEE NATIONAL BANK.

(.....Ark.....)

1. A judgment is not a lien on lands which the judgment debtor has previously conveyed, though with intent to defraud creditors, under Sand. & H. Dig. § 4204, which provides that judgments shall be liens on lands of the judgment debtors, and § 3049, providing for the sale on execution of lands of which the judgment debtor, or any person for his use, is seised in law or equity.
2. The superior diligence of a junior judgment creditor in bringing a suit to uncover land which had been conveyed after the judgments, in fraud of creditors, will entitle him to the proceeds.

(Battle and Riddick, JJ., dissent.)

(January 13, 1900.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Pulaski Chancery Court in favor of defendant in a proceeding to determine which creditor of George R. Brown had a superior right to certain lots belonging to him. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cockrill & Cockrill for appellee.

Messrs. Dodge, Johnson, Carroll, & Pemberton and D. H. Cantrell, for appellant.

A lien is neither a jus in re nor a jus in rem. It conferred no right of property, but a right to sell property.

Whiting v. Beebe, 12 Ark. 577; Roberts v. Jacks, 31 Ark. 600, 25 Am. Rep. 584.

The appellant by his negligent nonaction has suffered the debtor to dispose of a large amount of property that should and could have been subjected to the payment of his debt. He has suffered himself to be defrauded.

We are put to the alternative, either of losing our debt, or of collecting appellee's debt for him in order to clear the way for our lien.

As to the personal property we have the superior lien, because we filed our bill and made an equitable levy on it.

Senter v. Williams, 61 Ark. 189, 32 S. W. 490.

If it were not for the statute that makes a judgment a lien on land there is no question but that our judgment would take precedence, because, as said in Senter v. Williams, our equity is superior.

If, then, measuring the equities themselves, ours is a superior equity, why must not the statute yield to let it in, as it did in the case of the innocent purchaser in Stitz v. Chaytor, 55 Ark. 116, 17 S. W. 707.

The statute did not design to deprive a party of any advantage he might obtain by the exercise of superior diligence.

Smith v. Lind, 29 Ill. 27.

Although the statutes of our state provide generally that the first judgment creditor shall have the prior lien, yet when the junior creditor earns the right to precedence by superior diligence in discovering equitable assets, it should be given to him. Black, Judgm. § 455.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is between judgment creditors of George R. Brown to determine which of them has the superior right to certain lots in Little Rock. Appellant obtained judgment against Brown May 16, 1893, and had scire facias issued and served to revive same February 11, 1896, and judgment of revivor was rendered May 25, 1896. Appellee obtained its first judgment against Brown June 7, 1893, and the second May 10, 1895. Execution was issued on these October 29, 1895, and same was returned nulla bona. On the same day—October 29, 1895—appellee filed a complaint for itself alone to uncover certain property, including the lots in controversy, alleging that same had been conveyed by Brown in fraud of creditors. On December 21, 1896, appellant filed his intervention in appellee's suit, setting up his judgment lien, alleging that he was willing to contribute to the expenses of the action, that Brown was insolvent, and that an execution against him would be of no avail, and asking to be allowed to share in the proceeds of the creditors' bill filed by appellee. Appellee's answer to the intervention of appellant alleged a specific lien on the property by reason of the complaint filed by it, and asked that the rights of appellant under his judgment be subordinated to its lien. At the time of the filing of appellant's intervention appellee agreed with him that the assistance of his attorney in the prosecution of the creditors' suit would be waived, and that in the contest between them it would be considered as though appellant had rendered all the assistance that the law would require. Appellant filed a written assumption of his share of the costs. It was understood that all controversy between appellant and appellee as to their respective rights in the proceeds, if any, of the creditors' suit against Brown and others, should be postponed until that issue was settled. No execution was issued by appellant until long after the present suit had been brought and appellant's intervention had been filed. The decree on the original complaint and answer subjected the lots in controversy to the payment of Brown's debt. Of these lots some were conveyed before and some after the rendition of the judgments. The appellant contends that, as senior judgment creditor, he is entitled to have applied to the satisfaction of his judgment the entire proceeds from any sale that may be had of the lots which were fraudulently conveyed prior to the rendition of the judgment of either party. He grounds his contention upon the following sections of the Digest (Sandels & H.):

"4204. A judgment in the supreme, chancery or circuit court of this state or in the district or circuit court of the United States within this state shall be a lien on the real estate owned by the defendant in the county in which the judgment was rendered from the date of its rendition."

"3049. The following described property shall be liable to be seized and sold under any execution upon any judgment, order, or decree of a court of record: . . . Sixth. All real estate whether patented or not whereof the defendant or any person for his use, was seised in law or equity on the day of rendition of the judgment, order, or decree whereon execution issued, or at any time thereafter."

Appellant also relies upon the following decisions of this court: Ringgold v. Waggoner, 14 Ark. 69; Apperson v. Ford, 23 Ark. 746-759; Bennett v. Hutson, 33 Ark. 762; Hershy v. Latham, 46 Ark. 542; Wormser v. Merchants' Nat Bank, 49 Ark. 117, 4 S. W. 198; Cohn v. Hoffman, 50 Ark. 108, 6 S. W. 511; Stix v. Chaytor, 55 Ark. 116-123, 17 S. W. 707; McNeill v. Carter, 57 Ark. 579, 22 S. W. 94.

The statute gives a lien from the day of the rendition of the judgment upon the real estate owned by the defendant, or whereof he, or any person for his use, is seised in law or equity. Where a debtor has fraudulently conveyed his real estate before any judgment is rendered against him, or has procured same to be fraudulently conveyed to another, he is not in any sense the owner of such real estate, nor is he thereafter seised in law or equity of such real estate, nor is the grantee seised for his use. The authorities generally recognize the fact that a deed to land, although fraudulently conveyed, carries the title of the grantor. The deed is good inter paries. Mew v. Anthony, 11 Ark. 411, 52 Am. Dec. 274; Millington v. Hill, 47 Ark. 309, 1 S. W. 547; Bell v. Wilson, 52 Ark. 171, 5 L. R. A. 370, 12 S. W. 328; Bump, Fraud. Conv. §§ 432, 433; Wait, Fraud. Conv. §§ 395-399; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. p. 771; and authorities cited by these. The fraudulent grantee gets a title that he can alienate, and by so doing confer a perfect title upon his alienee, if the alienee be an innocent purchaser for value. This is the doctrine of our own court and of nearly all the states. Ringgold v. Waggoner, 14 Ark. 69; Stix v. Chaytor, 55 Ark. 116-123, 17 S. W. 707; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 386; Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 492, and numerous authorities cited. Of course, this would not be possible if the conveyance of the fraudulent grantor did not carry the title to the fraudulent grantee. It follows, then, logically and necessarily, that under this statute alone the judgment creditor has no lien upon lands fraudulently conveyed by the debtor prior to the rendition of his judgment. This construction certainly conforms to the plain and unequivocal language of the act. Why should we so change and extend it as to make it apply to lands which the defendant, at the time of the rendition of the judgment, did not own, and of which neither he nor anyone for him, was seised in law or equity. To so construe it would be judicial legislation, and that, too, with unjust results; because, "when the law gives priority, equity will follow it" (Senter v. Williams, 61 Ark. 189, 32 S. W. 490); and in passing upon the rights of judgment creditors to lands fraudulently conveyed prior to the rendition of the judgments the effect would be to ignore that old and excellent maxim of equity, Vigilantibus non dormientibus æquitas subvenit, and to declare in favor of those merely prior in time, although ever so unequal in diligence. Such a doctrine would encourage fraudulent judgments. It would impose oftentimes upon the junior judgment creditor the expensive, but still thankless and bootless, task of uncovering assets, which by his diligence, he had discovered, for the benefit of another, or else the disagreeable experience of seeing the fraudulent debtor concealing and appropriating to his own use assets which justly belonged to his creditors. But, while the language of the statute itself is plainly against a construction which would lead to such inequitable consequences, appellant, to sustain his contention for a lien, would have us construe § 3472, Sandels & H. Dig., as in pari materia, and to hold that his judgment was a lien on Brown's estate, just as though the legal title had been all the time in Brown. The section referred to is as follows: "Every conveyance . . . of any estate or interest in lands made or contrived with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors or other persons of their lawful actions, damages, forfeitures, debts or demands, as against creditors and purchasers prior and subsequent shall be void." If the latter statute is to be taken as in pari materia with the statute under consideration as between judgment creditors and their debtors, still that cannot aid appellant. Ever since the passage of 13 Eliz., after which our statute as to fraudulent conveyances was modeled, the word "void," as therein used, has generally been held to mean "voidable." Mew, Eng. Case Law Dig. 338, and authorities collected; Pom. Contr. § 282, and authorities cited; Bump. Fraud. Conv. § 451, and authorities cited in note 1. As we have seen supra, such is the view of our own court, and this is undoubtedly correct, for every fraudulent conveyance carries the legal title, subject only to defeasance by creditors and purchasers. Such conveyance is not void per se, even as between the debtor and creditor; much less between creditor and debtor. Even as between debtor and creditor, if the creditor condones the fraud, and takes no steps to avoid the conveyance, it stands forever as a divestiture of the title of the debtor. Nor will the mere rendition of a judgment in favor of the creditor against the debtor avoid the latter's fraudulent conveyance. The judgment simply fixes the amount of the debtor's liability, for which is subject the property he actually owns, or of which he or someone for him, is seised and possessed. Nor do courts of law annul and set aside fraudulent conveyances. Some process, after judgment at law is rendered, is necessary in order to fix and secure a lien upon property that has been fraudulently conveyed, and to uncover it for the judgment creditor. In some jurisdictions the creditor has choice of three remedies: "First, he may sell the debtor's land upon execution issued on his judgment, and leave the purchaser to contest the validity of the defendant's title in an action of ejectment; or, secondly, he may bring an action in equity to remove the fraudulent obstruction to the enforcement of his lien by execution, and await the result of the action before selling the property; or, thirdly, he may, on the return of an execution unsatisfied, bring an action in the nature of a creditor's bill to have the conveyance adjudged fraudulent and void as to his judgment, and the lands sold by a receiver or other officer of the court, and the proceeds applied to the satisfaction of the judgment, as, in the case of equitable interests, the debtor's assets are reached and applied." So it is said by the supreme court of Minnesota in Jackson v. Holbrook, 36 Minn. 494, 32 N. W. 852; also in Erickson v. Quinn, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 166. Those states which hold, under statutes similar to ours, that a judgment is a lien upon property fraudulently conveyed prior to its rendition, may very properly and consistently adopt the first of the above-named remedies, to wit, to sell the debtor's land upon execution, and leave the purchaser to contest the validity of the defendant's title in an action of ejectment. But it is apparent that, if the conveyance is to be treated upon the simple rendition of a judgment, as though it had never been made, and the property, notwithstanding such conveyance, is still the debtor's, then it is inconsistent to say, and idle and useless to hold, that the creditor may elect to adopt the above remedy, or go into chancery to remove the fraudulent obstruction to the enforcement of his lien by execution, or bring a creditors' bill to have the conveyance adjudged fraudulent and void as to his judgment; for, if the property so fraudulently conveyed is nevertheless, still owned and seised by the debtor, then an execution on the judgment at law will reach it, and there is in fact no fraudulent obstruction to the enforcement of his lien by execution, and there is no necessity for a creditors' bill to have the conveyance adjudged fraudulent and void as to his judgment, because there is nothing that obstructs the enforcement of such judgment at law. The courts which fall into such glaring incongruities in prescribing the remedies under this statute are no more discriminating, logical, and consistent when discussing the principles upon which the rights are founded giving rise to the remedies. All the authorities which hold that a judgment creditor has a judgment lien upon land which has been fraudulently conveyed by the debtor prior to the rendition of the judgment are grounded upon the egregious fallacy that a fraudulent conveyance is not voidably merely, but absolutely void. Slattery v. Jones, 96 Mo. 216, 8 S. W. 554; Jackson v. Holbrook, 36 Minn. 494, 32 N. W. 852; Freeman, Executions, § 136, and authorities there cited; Jacoby's Appeal, 67 Pa. 434; Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 530.
